I just can't feed my hunger

From staff and wire reports

But those plastic sandwiches look so real!
A thief in British Columbia allegedly entered a 7-Eleven convenience store to steal two breakfast sandwiches around 3 a.m. last week. But when he left the store, he realized that what he'd stolen were two plastic reproductions of sandwiches — not the actual sandwiches. The models of the sandwiches cost up to $70.

Evidently, when the thief discovered the sandwiches were fake, he threw one across the street and pocketed the other. Police were able to track the suspect to a nearby hotel, where he returned the stolen plastic sandwich. Officers recovered the other plastic sandwich and returned it to the store owner, who decided not to press charges.

NOTED. Kesha, a tiger performing at a circus in Kazakhstan, urinated on members of the V.I.P section of the audience. After the trainer cracked the whip, Kesha was supposed to perform a trick. But instead he lifted his leg and sent a powerful jet of urine right into the arena's most expensive seats. Apparently, the victims laughed it off.

QUOTED. "It tasted so good though!"
—Joey Leaphart, who allegedly pretended to represent the show America's Funniest Home Videos to convince a woman in a Georgia Wal-Mart to let him suck her toe. Cops arrested him shortly after the woman screamed at him to stop. He's being held on a misdemeanor count of battery.
