THE BEGINNING OF THE END

A 136-page report might be the conclusion to UNC's academic scandal

Thomas Ross, president of the University of North Carolina, speaks about the Wainstein report that revealed several UNC faculty to be guilty of creating paper classes for athletes.

By Bradley Saacks

University Editor

It was all a lie.

After years of questions and insufficient responses, Wednesday's press conference gave the final answer.

It was an athletic scandal — a scheme devised, ultimately, by an administrative assistant and the former chairman of the Department of African and Afro-American Studies. The two were asked by the athletic teams' academic counselors to keep athletes eligible to play. They were desperate to help students who struggled to adapt to UNC's rigorous academics.

Kenneth Wainstein, the former federal prosecutor hired by UNC to independently investigate academic misconduct, released the findings of his eight-month-long investigation in a 136-page report Wednesday.

The report revealed staggering statistics about the African and Afro-American studies and the ways Deborah Crowder, a secretary in the department until her retirement in 2009, and Julius Nyang'oro, former chairman of the department, created thousands of paper classes.

According to the report, more than 3,100 students received irregular instruction in African and Afro-American studies paper classes, where students would not have to attend class or complete any assignments, except one a paper due at the end of the semester that Crowder, a non-faculty member, would grade extremely leniently.

Wainstein and his team combed through 1.6 million emails and electronic student records and recruited a team of outside experts from UCLA, George Washington University and Princeton to review 150 student papers that were previously thought to be destroyed.

"Because of that thoroughness and the breadth of the investigation, I believe we now know all that we are able to know about what happened and how it happened," said UNC-system

Campus shocked by Jan Boxill's involvement

Wainstein's report included evidence against Jan Boxill.

By Jordan Nash and Grace Raynor Senior Writers

It's the irony that hurts the most. The revelations in Kenneth Wainstein's report that former faculty chairwoman and preeminent scholar on sports ethics Jan Boxill was responsible for funneling student-athletes into bogus paper classes and making sure they received the grade they would need to stay eligible was like a kick to the stomach for her friends and colleagues who relied on Boxill to help guide the University out of the maelstrom of academic impropriety.

Boxill was the the chairwoman of the faculty from April 2011 to June 2014 after serving as women's basketball academic counselor.

Boxill didn't return seven calls for comment. Her employment status as a professor in the UNC Department of Philosophy and the director of the Parr Center for Ethics is unknown. She is no longer listed as director on the center's website.

Bruce Cairns, the current chairman of the faculty, said he could not comment on personnel matters regarding the release of the report and those who were named in it.

Chancellor Carol Folt said nine employees would face disciplinary action - which could include termination — as a result of the report. Folt said at least four people would be terminated. The names of those employees have not been released.

Wainstein report in 4 easy questions

Here's everything you wanted to know but were too afraid to ask.

By Amanda Albright Projects and Investigations Team Leader

Kenneth Wainstein released his report Wednesday with the help of 126 interviewees, including former African and Afro-American studies department chairman Julius Nyang'oro and secretary Deborah Crowder.

Why is the Wainstein report significant?

Former federal prosecutor Wainstein linked the athletic department to the scandal. At least two dozen current and former personnel in athletic, academic and advising departments knew about the fake classes.

The other important piece was that the classes were used to keep athletes eligible. Counselors would tell Crowder and Nyang'oro the grades that athletes needed to stay academically eligible and assign the grades accordingly, the report states.

Other reports, such as the 2012 report by former N.C. Gov. Jim Martin, found that counselors didn't collude with Crowder and steer athletes to the classes. But Wainstein's report found that wasn't true.

Toto's barely a canine anymore

From staff and wire reports

new haircut can change a person - or a dog. That's exactly what happened to "Jin Dan the Pomeranian," a dog in China that reportedly saw itself in a mirror, became aware of its new look and began to "protest" the haircut by walking on only his hind legs for two days. According to reports from Gawker, Jin Dan's owner consulted vets, who attributed the dog's behavior to psychological trauma induced by the haircut. Even in a world filled with an overabundance of weird, viral videos starring animals, we're aware this story sounds near impossible, but we'd like to buy into it anyway. The little pooch has reportedly assumed its normal stance, but it's left us all with a healthy reminder to think twice before we give Toto a grooming.

AN EYE FOR DESIGN Designers, stagehands and producers tell their story

By Everett Handy Staff Writer

While actors and directors are showered in applause, the unsung stars of theater are behind the curtain. These people transform empty spaces into distant worlds, drape actors in clothing from all periods and places, and thrill the audience with special effects. Their hard work breathes life into the show and often goes unrecognized.

Andrew Jones has been the technical designer for every Rogue Players production since the group formed in March of 2013. From Shakespeare's bloodiest play, "Titus" to their most recent show "Beautiful Child," he has used technical design to show that there is more that goes into a performance than just acting and directing.

The empty barroom of Chapel Hill Underground presented a challenge for Jones, who needed to transform the dark space into a stage for February's "Beautiful Child." Jones focused his designs around the audience's experience, coordinating the lighting, visual projections and sound effects with the script. He also built a stage that extended into the audience to make viewers feel like they were part of the show.

"You have to make sure everything fits when running technical design," he said. "Because how your costumes, set and props look are all affected differently by various lighting and seating viewpoints. You have to take everything into consideration if you want a really good product for the entire audience."

Pauline Lamb, a UNC graduate student, has worked with Pauper Players and Company Carolina to do props, costume and makeup design, along with choreography and set building. She has worked on Pauper Players' "The Rocky Horror Show," "Sweeney Todd" and "Avenue Q" as well as Company Carolina's upcoming production of "Little Shop of Horrors."

"I think that some parts like properties, costumes and set design are not typically what people come to see when they go to a show," said Lamb. "But a lot more work goes into it than people think."

Lamb is currently the choreographer for "Little Shop of Horrors," but said she also enjoys working with props, costume and makeup design.

"There is an element of design to my work, and like any artist anything I create I want to be good," Lamb said.

"Even if a property only appears on stage for five seconds - like Gary Coleman's colorful gun in 'Avenue Q' – that doesn't mean you can take a shortcut and use something store-bought. That'd just look out of place.'

Despite the preemptive planning and design that goes into these productions, during the performance, anything can happen. The stage manager must adjust to any malfunctions that might occur.

McKenzie Millican, a sophomore biology major, has stage managed "Sweeney Todd' and "Avenue Q" and produced "Dracula."

"When the show finally begins, the director and the designers metaphorically hand over the show to the stage manager because at that point there is nothing more that they can do," Millican said.

"Preparing for a show, the stage manager has to be at everything. That's usually four hours a night five days a week but it's so fun because you are constantly building relationships with everyone in the cast, production crew and designers. The great production you create with everyone together in the end is worth it."

Students to protest BOG

Activists will lead an effort during Friday's board meeting.

By Corey Risinger Staff Writer

Dozens of UNC-system students will walk out of classes Friday to protest several system policies during the UNC Board of Governors' meeting.

Members of N.C. Student Power Union chapters from UNC-Greensboro, N.C. State University and UNC-Chapel Hill will protest from their individual campuses as the meeting begins in Chapel Hill.

"The board is inherently undemocratic," said Elizabeth Brown, organizer for UNC-CH's chapter of Student Power. "It's 32 un-elected officials, most of whom have no background in education."

At the budget and finance committee meeting, the board's working group on financial aid and tuition will present its final report.

The "freeze and cap" plan, approved at the board's August meeting, dictates that schools already using more than 15 percent of tuition revenue for need-based aid – like UNC-CH – cannot allocate additional tuition funds for financial aid, and are frozen at their 2014-15 levels of funding.

Board member Marty Kotis said the policy doesn't limit other, larger sources of financial aid, but instead aims to prevent increases in tuition.

"I don't even know what (students) are protesting now, and you'd think someone would have called or emailed to let us know what their concerns are," he said. "Gathering together and chanting isn't always most effective."

Alex Parker, president of the UNC-system Association of Student Governments and the only student member on the board, said he disagrees with the new need-based aid policy.

"We definitely need to have a larger study done on the actual effects this policy is causing," he said.

Students should get involved in university decision-making, he said, by communicating with board members and attending open meetings - rather than having more student members on the board.

Brown said she doesn't plan to attend the meeting. She said the most important discussions among board members take place behind closed doors.

The UNC-G chapter of N.C. Student Power Union will present a list of proposed changes to the UNC system, Bryant said. The list emphasizes the reality of student debt and the need to address the firings of three UNC-G employees who were accused of working other jobs on university time.

Aaron Bryant, campus organizer for UNC-G's chapter of N.C. Student Power Union, said he hopes to call attention to the need for representative bodies that truly represent students.

'We're not necessarily as concerned about large numbers as we are raising voices."

Faculty rejoice at LGBT employee benefits

The Committee on LGBTQ Life discussed the impact of the ban.

By Mohammed Hedadji Staff Writer

Members of the Provost's Committee on LGBTQ Life said they were surprised at how quickly North Carolina's ban on gay marriage was struck down.

"It has happened so much faster than anyone could have imagined," said law professor Maxine Eichner in a meeting Monday morning.

A group of ten students, faculty and postdoctorate candidates met to review the implications of the ruling.

Committee chairman Christopher Putney, who is openly gay, led the meeting and opened with recognition of the significance of last week's event.

'This is a monumental time with the new developments," Putney said.

North Carolina voters passed Amendment One, declaring that the state only recognizes marriage as between a man and a woman, in May 2012, and at the time, he said he thought it would never be overturned.

"It seemed like it was (going to be) here forever," Putney said. "I remember the dismay I felt when it passed."

Committee members, many of whom said they were affected by the amendment and opposed to its passing, said they are confident the ban won't be reinstated in the future.

'Theoretically, it is a possibility," Eichner said."But who wants to be on the wrong side of history when there is so much momentum?"

Eichner, who was very involved in the fight against Amendment One after it was passed, doubts any reversal will happen, because no opposition in other states has succeeded in doing so.

"It seems almost impossible to think that the Supreme Court would review this case," Eichner said, "So, it's over."

Several committee members, including LGBTQ Center director Terri Phoenix, said UNC staff were treated differently based on their sexual orientation when it came to employment benefits.

"There was inequitable treatment," Phoenix said. "That is absolutely true."

UNC media and cultural studies professor Richard Cante said the difference in treatment was in accordance with North Carolina law.

"It's not illegal to discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation, according to North Carolina law," Cante said.

Spouses of UNC faculty who entered same-sex marriages before Oct. 13 will see health care coverage beginning as early as Nov. 1.

After discussing their experiences and the issues that existed, the committee recognized that there are still many problems to be dealt with, but the overwhelming majority agreed that a burden had been removed from the LGBTQ community as a result of the Supreme Court's ruling. "We're just like everyone else," Putney said.

"And it's wonderful."

Football aims to move from scandal and onto Cavs

The Tar Heels will travel to Charlottesville, Va. Saturday to take on UVa.

By Brendan Marks Assistant Sports Editor

Tim Scott has seen all the cracks with the North Carolina football team. An interim head coach his freshman season. Then, a bowl ban and another new coach as a sophomore. Now a senior, his defense has already given up record-setting highs in both points and yards.

But even with all the setbacks, something even greater has plagued Scott the past four years.

Since coming to light in 2011, accusations of academic fraud and eligibility concerns have marred not only the football team, but UNC athletics as a whole. Resulting postseason sanctions, scholarship reductions and personnel turnover — including the dismissal of Butch Davis – have left the program in limbo.

Wednesday, answers finally came. Independent investigator and former federal prosecutor Kenneth Wainstein released the results of his eight-month probe into claims of academic fraud surrounding the former African and Afro-American Studies department. Among other things, Wainstein's report cleared all current student-athletes of any wrongdoing, but Scott said that culture was erased long ago.

"Even when I was here my freshman year, when I first stepped on, (that culture) was gone," Scott said. "They tried to just forget all about it and just leave it alone, which they've been doing the last four years."

Larry Fedora, who took over for interim coach Everett Withers following the 2011-12 season, inherited the same problems as his players.

"All I'll say is I'm glad it's done, I'm glad it's over with so we can move on," Fedora said. "We've been trying to do that, you know as a program for a while now."

Now, just three days away from its matchup with UVa. (4-3, 2-1 ACC), the team plans to put Wainstein's findings out of mind for good.

For Fedora, that means no more paper classes. No more unwarranted grades. From here on out, as the third-year coach has always maintained in the face of these accusations, everything is strictly football.

"That's about it. I can't tell you what they're taking or, I mean, I couldn't tell you what one guy's major is right now, but I can tell you what Virginia's gonna do," Fedora said. Run.

Senior tailback Kevin Parks has over 500 rushing yards and three touchdowns this season.

"Anybody ever tried to catch a mouse in a house, you know it's kind of tough - they know where every little hiding place is," defensive coordinator Vic Koenning said. "I'm not saying he's a mouse, that's not what I'm saying, but I'm saying he finds all the little creases and cracks and does a great job of getting through there."

With both its athletic reputation and its leaky run defense, UNC wants to accomplish one thing this weekend. Seal up all the cracks.

Among the most revealing pieces of evidence against Boxill were her 2008 emails to Deborah Crowder, the former administrative assistant in the former Department of African and Afro-American Studies. The two discussed the grades a women's basketball player needed in a paper class to maintain eligibility.

In the report, women's basketball coach Sylvia Hatchell knew that Boxill had a good relationship with Crowder and assumed that friendship was the reason many of her players were enrolled in African and Afro-American studies department classes.

President Tom Ross.

Ready to embrace UNC's past failures, Chancellor Carol Folt spoke candidly during a press conference Wednesday and braced herself for the questions that had been looming for four years.

Wainstein's report, which included interviews with Crowder and Nyang'oro who both had never participated in an investigation before, spelled out what had long been reported. Athletes were steered toward classes where they would have to do little work and would receive high marks.

"It's a case where you have bad actions of a few and the inactions of many," Folt said. "You need processes that protect integrity."

A 'University issue'

For the first time, Chancellor Carol Folt acknowledged the department of athletics' involvement in the scandal that led to the resignation of beloved former Chancellor Holden Thorp and, eventually, criminal indictments in 2013 by an Orange County grand jury.

"Was this an academic or an athletic issue? Clearly it was an issue in both areas. It was a university issue," Folt said. "They trusted us with their education, and they took these courses and they deserved so much better."

Administrators still stand by the fact that the origin of the problem lied in academic impropriety - not the Department of Athletics and Hatchell said Boxill was in charge of coordinating classes for the players and never let on that the classes were irregularly taught.

According to the document, Crowder emailed Boxill asking, "Did you say a D will do for (the basketball player)?" Boxill emailed back, "Yes a D will be fine; that's all she needs."

Yet, Jean DeSaix, a biology professor and good friend of Boxill, said clarifying what grade a player needs to remain academically eligible does not necessarily mean she was requesting the professor give the player that grade.

"People come in all the time and say I need a D," DeSaix said. "Well, I hear what they're saying but if they

According to the report, Boxill was fully aware of how the classes were handled, including that Crowder had a lot of influence in the grading, and that they were irregular. Between 1999 and 2009, there were 114 women's basketball players enrolled in paper classes and the players were encouraged to take these classes by Boxill, their academic counselor.

Nyang'oro told Wainstein and his team he would only accept the players into his paper classes per an explicit request from Boxill, adding that he would give players certain grades upon her request. 'He recalled one particular situation when he gave a women's basketball player a

B+ even though he felt her paper was 'terrible' and was a 'clear F," Wainstein wrote in the report. The report stated that Nyang'oro gave this grade becasue Boxill requested that he give the player a higher grade to maintain eligibility.

DeSaix admitted she was biased because of her friendship with Boxill, but said she still had a hard time believing that Boxill would blatantly participate in unethical practices.

"Ĵan is so, so ethical. It just — I don't know — I can't even make sense out of it," she said. "It doesn't feel right to me."

Wainstein said Boxill added content to some players' papers, adding text to the introductions and conclusions.

"Boxill emailed a player a revised paper and explained that she had 'add(ed) some stuff for the intro and conclusion," the report said.

Boxill acknowledged that she added content to the students' papers, but said the additions were "minor" and "not substantive."

DeSaix said that even though she knew the situation with irregular classes was problematic, she doesn't fully believe that Boxill lost her ethical compass amid it.

"I am sure I am inclined to read (the report) very differently than other people will," DeSaix said.

"Clearly bad things happened. I mean, clearly bad things happened. It just does not ring true to me that Jan would cross a line so completely."

DeSaix said she hopes the University can move forward with as little negative response as possible.

"I mean we have lost one chancellor — one really good chancellor — because of how this was handled," DeSaix said.

"I can see that Chancellor Folt needs to do whatever she needs to do to move forward, and I absolutely believe she will take us forward in a good way and I can't second-guess what she is going to need to do to do that."

"Trying to speculate on the end would be inappropriate at this time," Cunningham said. "I have no idea how long it will take."

In interviews with basketball coach Roy Williams, who brought UNC two national championships in 2005 and 2009, and basketball counselor Wayne Walden, Wainstein's team found that Walden knew about the paper classes and that Crowder was grading the assignments, despite the fact that she had no training as a professor.

Now Walden was Williams' main guy. The two had come to UNC with now-retired director of basketball operations Joe Holladay from the University of Kansas in 2003. Walden promised Wainstein that Williams had no idea his players were enrolled in classes that never met and were being graded by staff members with no background in academia. During the press conference, Wainstein said "his gut" told him to trust Walden's claims.

Back to Cunningham for comment on whether Williams and other coaches implicated in the report would still have a job after Wednesday.

"This report we received today doesn't give me any evidence to do anything right now relative to additional punishment," Cunningham said.

What frustrated senior Taylor Webber-Fields most about the revelations this week was the bad reputation she believes will now hang over her degree. She plans to graduate with a degree in African, African American and Diaspora studies in the spring.

"They're saying that this is an overall investigation of the tendencies of the University, but it's been solely focused on the African American and Diaspora studies department," she said in the open meeting Folt held for the students and faculty to discuss the report.

"There's this general feeling of, 'You're getting a joke diploma,' that it's not important, that it's not on the same level of academia as the rest of the school." Folt said she would champion for Webber-Fields and her peers in African, African American and Diaspora studies once they graduate.

"Folt's response was satisfactory to me because it seemed like she would be an advocate for me or the school would be an advocate for me," Webber-Fields said.

Nine up in the air

The University will take discplinary action — which could include termination against at least nine employees, Folt said. The University had decided to terminate at least four people, she said.

She refused to release the names of the faculty members being terminated.

"We have pretty strict rules about privacy. We don't give anybody's name - ever — in the press so I'm not going to talk about them individually.

By the end of the day, it seemed everyone was ready to close this ugly chapter of UNC's history.

Lowry Caudill, chairman of the Board of Trustees, said Wednesday was painful, but worthwhile.

"I love this place. You can sit through and listen to what has happened so we can learn and be a better organization moving forward."

Senior writers Jane Wester, Langston Taylor and Sara Salinas contributed reporting.

university@dailytarheel.com

To what level was the athletic department involved?

Several counselors within the Academic Support Program for Student-Athletes were found to direct athletes to the fake courses. The report said counselors who steered athletes were affiliated with the football team, such as Cynthia Reynolds, Beth Bridger, Octavus Barnes and Jaimie Lee. Basketball tutors Burgess McSwain and Wayne Walden and soccer tutor Brent Blanton also steered athletes, Wainstein found. Blanton said he directed players, such as U.S. National Team players, toward these classes as a way to reduce their workload rather than keep them eligible, according to the report.

Lee and Blanton still work at UNC and Blanton is now associate director of the Academic Support Program for Student-Athletes.

John Blanchard, former senior associate athletics director and Robert Mercer, director of the support program, knew the so-called lecture courses never met, but thought they were otherwise legitimate classes, according to Wainstein report.

The academic support program was under the athletic department's control until summer 2013. It now reports to the Office of the Provost.

How were professors involved?

The report found that former faculty chairwoman Jan Boxill asked for women's basketball players grades to be changed, steered players to the courses and that Boxill occasionally rewrote parts of players' papers. She served as a counselor for the women's basketball team at the time and continued to ask for grades until at least 2010.

Tim McMillan, a current professor within the Department of African, African American and Diaspora Studies, signed grade sheets for at least seven classes he did not teach, according to Wainstein's report. "I don't know why (my signature) is there, but it is there," McMillan was reported to say in an interview with Wainstein's team. Wainstein also points out that McMillan saw many red flags and did nothing, such as Crowder asking him to look over a paper and tell her what grade it deserved.

Eunice Sahle, the current chairwoman of the renamed African, African American and Diaspora studies department, also knew — to some extent about the courses Crowder irregularly taught. But she was not necessarily a proponent, the report found. An email between Crowder and Walden, the basketball tutor, corroborates this, the report found.

"I have already spoken to the professor (Sahle) and she is aware he (the studentathlete) cannot (sic) come because of the time and she will just give him an independent assignment. We can get by with one or two of those," the email states.

Alphonse Mutima, a Swahili professor in the department, knew generally about the irregular courses, failed to raise any questions about them with the administration and took advantage of the courses, Wainstein's report found. Crowder enrolled many student-athletes in Mutima's Swahili courses because it was considered an easy language, the report found. Though Mutima and Crowder originally butted heads about enrolling athletes, Mutima eventually began requesting that student-athletes be enrolled in the paper class because they were unruly, the report found.

How did the scandal happen?

Wainstein's report found that Crowder and Nyang'oro were largely driven by compassion and wanting to help student-athletes remain eligible to play. Nyang'oro once complained in an email to Crowder that some African and Afro-American studies faculty members "bitch as if there's no tomorrow...when you ask them to...help out a sinking kid."

As to how fake classes happened for so long, Wainstein offered a few theories. Some of the athletics personnel who knew about the paper classes said they stayed out of academic affairs.

'Do I or anyone in the Department of Athletics have any say in how departments structure their courses - NO!" Mercer said in one email after Auburn University underwent a similar independent studies scandal. Wainstein's report said this suggested the leaders might have tried to stay out of academic integrity issues

And as far as administrators who saw red flags about the classes, the report said the culture at UNC was to not interfere.

"At all levels of the University, the inclination was to minimize management and interference from the administration and maximize the professor's latitude to design his or her own approach to instruction and research."

Costume racism is a scary thing

efore you head out to Halloween on Franklin Street this year, think twice about what you are wearing and ask yourself a few questions:

Have you appointed yourself the comic representative of a culture, ethnicity or race that has been historically oppressed and exploited?

Do you belong to that group of people?

Would you wear your costume around that group of people?

What is your aim in wearing that costume? Regardless of the answer, innocent intentions do not give you a carte blanche.

Putting on a sombrero and poncho, a Native American headdress or blackface perpetuates stereotypes and reinforces damaging racist attitudes.

People have to live with the discrimination and injustice associated with your "costume." They can't take it off.

Take a quick second to think about the immense privilege you have in donning blackface or borrowing someone's race for a day - of making a costume out of the physical and cultural characteristics that determine people's life outcomes. UNC should use Wainstein's report as a springboard.

or many people associated with this University, Wednesday's release of the Wainstein report was almost cathartic. It is nice, in some ways, to have everything out on the table, to have the denizens of Pack Pride message boards no longer be the reigning authority on UNC's misdeeds.

But the Wainstein report doesn't solve our problems — it only details them. Two questions that we and the University remain tasked with answering are why this happened and what's next? Over the long term, we must address the conditions that incentivized these violations and remove them from this University and its athletic department. It is crucial that UNC be a national leader in this regard. Students and fans should be unequivocal in their call for increased transparency and reform, not only at UNC but throughout the structures that govern the national relationship between athletics and academics. Though the academic fraud detailed in the report seems to be a thing of the past, the pressures that led to it are not. This problem did not begin with Deborah Crowder, and it has not ended with her departure. A popular topic of debate is whether this was an academic scandal tions extremely seriously. or an athletic one. While It is our hope that her non-athletes did benefit seriousness will translate into a willingness to take on larger structural issues, even if UNC must go at it alone. A problem of this scale cannot be solved with patchwork regulation. It requires a broader rethinking of the role UNC has played in upholding institutions that force universities to hold many studentathletes to an impossible standard - at the student-athletes' expense.

Now is the time for this debate. In the days to come, the narrative of what has occurred will crystallize further. Once the dust settles, the specifics of this case will give way to questions concerning the viability of the current studentathlete model.

To be sure, large numbers of student-athletes are perfectly capable of academic success. But the current system ensures that those abilities take a back seat to their athletic performance both in recruitment and upon arrival at UNC. The University should look into reforms deemphasizing the pretense that student-athletes admitted on the basis of their athletic abilities must perform in the classroom at the same pace as students admitted for their academic achievements. It would be ridiculous to ask those students admitted for their academics to box out Jabari Parker, and it would take a similar amount of fraud to convince anyone that they could.

Lighter standards for students needed

TO THE EDITOR:

Wainstein's report on the academic scandal reveals the need for more flexible eligibility requirements for all students. The time student-athletes dedicate to their sports is not generally compatible with the ability to successfully complete a fully demanding course load while maintaining any hope of a healthy stress-level, sleep schedule or social life. Though many students are successful in the face of tremendously demanding schedules, all students should not be required to take 12 credit hours per semester. Students are able and permitted, due to diverse reasons, to graduate early, but the many students who are unable to complete a degree in eight semesters while fully observing the honor code are not permitted to graduate late without applying for extra semesters or by starting off as part-time students (and thus being ineligible to participate in athletic programs, to qualify for financial aid and to live on-campus).

The report published yesterday tangentially mentions a few non-athletic circumstances which led students to paper classes, including being survivors of trauma and living with mental illness. To say that students took paper classes simply out of entitlement or laziness ignores the degree to which students' diverse circumstances can pragmatism in an election cycle that has been dominated by sound bytes, attack ads and vitriol.

Mary finds herself in a similar ideological position to UNC students. She supports low taxes for everyone, especially poor and working North Carolinians, and she supports passing responsibly sized budgets. But she also opposed Amendment One, supports state funding of higher education and research and supports several reforms for how undocumented immigrants are treated at a state level, including allowing them to receive state-issued drivers' licenses.

But what makes Mary so unique is that she can bring these ideas into the majority caucus if elected in November. Students and the University need a champion in the State Senate, and if elected, Mary Lopez Carter will be the most effective person to fill that role.

As early voting begins this Thursday, please make informed choices about all races, and please consider who will be most effective when representing students.

Sporting culture to blame for fraud

TO THE EDITOR:

The Wainstein report is neither shocking nor unexpected. In the Division 1 culture such a large emphasis is placed on athletics that the fact a university would resort to academic fraud comes as no real shock. The report today is a mere indication of the overall problem inside collegiate athletics. Players are athletes first and students as an afterthought. They are pawns in a greater shell game of financial gains and prestige. This is not a UNC problem, it is a cultural problem in the United States as a whole. Who is to blame? Everyone who tunes into a college game on Saturday, who places bets with the sports books, everyone who fills out a bracket in the spring. We as a whole must accept the responsibility. Who suffers the most? It's the student-athletes, who are are promised a first-class education. Never in all the pages of the report did anyone ask, "How are we going to educate these kids?" It was always, "How are we going to keep them eligible?" The coaches who insulated themselves so they could pass down an edict and turn a blind eye hold as much accountability as those who passed these kids to a fake class system meant to defraud the University, the NCAA, the state of North Carolina and most importantly, the students themselves.

Today, you can surf the web and buy an "Indian Chief" costume, complete with a headdress, vial of paint for tribal markings - all with free shipping to boot. This commodification of attire into costumes not only painfully idealizes Native American society, but profits off of a people who have been the subjects of genocide and erasure since the year 1492. It constructs their identities as homogenous and frozen in time.

Cultural appropriation and historical misrepresentation are by no means confined to Halloween.

Washington, DC's football team is somehow still called the "Redskins," as Dan Snyder, the team's owner, seems to believe racial justice comes secondary to petty tradition.

And last year, the fraternity Delta Kappa Epsilon threw a "Vietnam Cocktail" party, where students reportedly wore Vietnamese straw hats and Viet Cong flags, among other garments.

White people are not the only ones who can be complicit in racism. Don't get me wrong - racism is a system of oppression that is consequence of white supremacy. And white supremacy does not refer merely to the Ku Klux Klan, white hoods and burning of crosses.

It refers to the normalization of whiteness, which designates everyone else as foreign or exotic - perfect costume material.

You do not have to think, "I am intentionally discriminating based on race" to be complicit in racism. We do not live in a post-racial society, as a matter of fact.

This Halloween, don't roll your eyes or smugly say "It's just a joke," or, "Don't be so sensitive." Yes, it is a night where you can be anything you want to be. But hopefully, that won't be someone who believes their fun is worth more than other's pain.

DROPPING THE 'THE' Matt Leming explores the intricacies of flipped classes.

decisive action and no longer be complicit in providing incentives for fraud.

This is not to say that the University's susceptibility to institutional pressure should exonerate it from the consequences of its crimes. More local incentives, such as the desire to protect the University's lofty reputation rather than acknowledge its struggling student-athletes, cannot be ignored.

It appears that the school has taken steps to provide more effective oversight to the troubled programs. Chancellor Carol Folt is clearly taking this report and its implica-

Chamber awards beloved 'Farmer Bob'

The Maple View Farm owner will enter the business hall of fame.

By Maggie Monsrud Staff Writer

The Chapel Hill-Carrboro Chamber of Commerce will induct six business leaders and families into its Hall of Fame on Nov. 13. The Daily Tar Heel will feature each of its inductees. Bob Nutter will be among those inducted.

To some, he is known as Bob Nutter. But to everyone else, he is known as "Farmer Bob," and he lives in "The White House."

Nutter, 86, made the decision in 1963 to move his dairy farm from Maine to North Carolina, and it paid off. Today, Maple View Farm is a household name, known for its milk and ice cream operations.

On Nov. 13, Nutter will be inducted into the Chapel Hill-Carrboro Business Hall of Fame for his lifelong dedication not only to farming, but also to Orange County.

Bob Woodruff, chairman of the selection committee, said picking Nutter was a fairly easy decision.

"One of the things that impressed the group, I think, was his decision to move his dairy farm from Maine to North Carolina," he said.

Nutter decided to move due to the cold climate of Maine and the better milk market in North Carolina. Farming has been in Nutter's blood for many generations.

"It's the only thing I know," Nutter said. "I just didn't think about doing anything else."

When the farm moved to North Carolina in 1963, it primarily produced milk. Today Maple View Farm has evolved to include milk bottling and ice cream production.

Susan Nichols, a longtime friend and employee of the farm, has known Nutter since 1963 and has worked for him for the past six years.

"Bob is probably the most devoted farmer I've ever met," Nichols said. "He is very serious about his job. He's a very compassionate man, he's genuinely concerned about his community and he does things for the community that people don't even realize."

She recalled how she first met Nutter. He was trying to change a heat filter while standing on the top part of a ladder.

"I was alarmed that he might fall, and he was alarmed that I thought he was an old man who couldn't do the chores," Nichols said. "He's 86 years old, but he still works like he's a young man."

Nichols said Nutter cares deeply about Orange County. The Maple View Ice Cream store donates ice cream for fundraisers. A portion of the proceeds from special events go to the Wounded Warriors Fund, American Cancer and Sam's Wish Fund, a group for children with serious health conditions.

Nichols said Nutter also donated books to elementary school children and established a program that provides dictionaries to third-graders in Orange County Schools.

"I think his support is for Orange County schools because he is an Orange County dairyman and his children went to Orange County schools, so he gives back to the school system," Susan Nichols said.

Nutter spent almost $1 million on the Maple View Agricultural Educational Center in Hillsborough – a nonprofit facility designed to educate both children and adults about agricultural life. Children learn about where their milk and food come from and how to eat healthy.

"Bob has one of the biggest hearts out of anyone I've met in my entire life. He is so generous to the people of Orange County," said Allison Nichols, executive director of the center. "He is an inspiration and a mentor to a lot of people, including myself."

Whenever Nutter isn't hard at work, he enjoys tagging along on the hay rides that tour the farm's property. He points up at his white house, letting everyone know that's where Farmer Bob lives.

"To young children he is just as important as someone who really does live in the White House," Susan Nichols said.

Construction delays in store for new hotel

Price negotiations stall the hotel at Southern Village.

By Tiffany Watkins Staff Writer

The Southern Village community is anticipating the arrival of a new hotel, but delays in construction might push the opening date back.

Construction of the Hyatt Place hotel was supposed to begin this past summer, but ongoing negotiations with the construction company regarding pricing is causing delays.

Bryan Properties, Inc. is the developer in charge of bringing the hotel to the area and has done other development work for Southern Village in the past.

"Bryan Properties is obviously a key community stakeholder in Chapel Hill, and they continue to be involved with a lot of management of Southern Village," said Lee Storrow, Chapel Hill Town Council member.

"It's a great firm to be in Southern Village and Chapel Hill as a whole."

The delays in construction are minor, said Dixon Pitt, property manager for Bryan Properties.

"It just got pushed back a bit, we're still working with the builder on coming up with pricing and getting all the figures together," Pitt said.

Pitt said construction on the hotel should begin any day now.

The opening date has not been officially changed from late 2015, but workers will be pressed to get things done on time.

"The construction has been pushed back, so it really probably won't start until the first quarter of next year," Pitt said.

Storrow said he is thrilled about the hotel and the contribution it will make to both the community and to businesses in Southern Village.

Southern Village residents are also excited for the new addition to the community, said Phil Meyer, treasurer of the Southern Village Homeowners Association.

"I think it's needed to provide more traffic in our retail liked the idea at first because the hotel will replace a parking lot that many residents thought was necessary.

But he said there is now little opposition to the hotel among community members because of the economic benefit the hotel could bring the community.

'We had many members of the Southern Village community come and speak at the council meeting when we talked about the hotel, and they were all very supportive of the location and the hotel

The benefits associated with the development include a short pedestrian path from the hotel to the retail center, Meyer said.

Pitt said the marketing for the hotel hasn't begun yet, but the goal is for Hyatt Place to appeal to the needs of a wide variety of clientele, not just businesspeople.

"We'd like to appeal to a wide range," he said. "We think Southern Village will act as an amenity that would appeal to both families and people on business travel."

PTA Thrift Shop director named to nonprofit board

By Wei Zhou Staff Writer

After heading one of the most prominent and successful nonprofits in the area, Barbara Jessie-Black is getting recognition at the state level.

Jessie-Black, executive director of the PTA Thrift Shop, was elected to the Board of Directors of the North Carolina Center for Nonprofits.

She has been the thrift shop's executive director for 10 years and has worked with nonprofits for 20 years. She started on the board in August. She said the board approached her and offered her the position. Before she was on the board, the PTA Thrift Shop was already a member of the center.

"I was very flattered when they spoke to me about joining the board," she said.

She said her main responsibilities on the board include overseeing the financial activities of the organization and bringing in new members.

The center chooses candidates for its board of directors based on their past experience and set of skills, said Emily Zimmern, chairwoman of the board. She said the board is diverse in terms of its members' geographic locations and professional backgrounds.

Zimmern said Jessie-Black is the only board member from Orange County, and her unique background brings valuable experience to the board.

'That is the kind of learning and kind of crosspollination that really makes the board of the center very excited to bring those differences, those different ways of doing things and the different community contexts from across the state," she said.

DTH/CATHERINE HEMMER

Barbara Jessie-Black was elected as a member of the Board of Directors of the North Carolina Center for Nonprofits in August.

The board chooses candidates who are respectful and deeply committed to the nonprofit sector, Scott Wierman, vice chairman of the board, said. He said Jessie-Black has a strong reputation for being an effective leader.

"She is well-regarded as a nonprofit leader in terms of understanding governance, understanding the issues and challenges that are faced by nonprofits, and we thought she would be a wonderful addition to the board," he said.

Wierman said the PTA Thrift Shop's model is unique for nonprofits because the organization supports itself without relying on monetary donations. He said her experience with the shop's model of revenue generation would be particularly helpful.

"She brings very much the mindset of how can we bring best business practices to create a sustainable business model that will benefit nonprofits -Imean, how you create the most value you can for the greater good," Zimmern said.

Jessie-Black said she holds the board in high regard and hopes to make contributions. She said her experience in the nonprofit world will add to the board.

"I know how nonprofit world operates and how nonprofit organizations actually function, so I bring that to the table," she said.

Hagan targeted for flip-flop on Ebola

By Charles Talcott Staff Writer

Democratic Sen. Kay Hagan issued a statement on Friday calling for a travel ban on West African countries affected by Ebola and a larger coordinated effort to deal with the ongoing outbreak - and the N.C. Republican Party is accusing her of flipflopping on the issue.

"I am calling on the Administration to temporarily ban the travel of non-U.S. citizens from the affected countries in West Africa," said Hagan in the statement.

Her announcement came

10 days after the second U.S. Senate debate between Hagan and speaker Thom Tillis. Though Hagan did not dismiss a travel ban during the debate, she prioritized the need for coordinated treatment and containment and criticized Tillis' plan, which proposed a comprehensive travel ban.

"I am open to it in a broad range," Hagan said in the debate. "The problem is, if you isolate those countries, you're not going to solve the problem."

Hagan joins a number of other politicians who have recently shown support for a travel ban from West African countries. Tillis declared support for the ban on Oct. 2 and was the first U.S. Senate candidate nationwide to do so, said Tillis' campaign spokeswoman Meghan Burris in an email.

The N.C. GOP has accused Hagan of flip-flopping on the issue and being confused of her own position.

"If she always supported it, why did she call it a 'scare tactic?" said Will Allison, the party's spokesman, in a statement. "Why did her campaign issue a press release announcing her 'new' position on Friday?'

Kathryn Walker, president of UNC College Republicans, said Hagan's delayed reaction is an example of her failure to stand up for North Carolinians. "We need a senator who will do what is best for North Carolina, and Thom Tillis is that person," she said.

In her statement supporting the travel ban, Hagan said she wants the Obama Administration to take action immediately.

"I have said for weeks that travel restrictions should be one part of a broad strategy to prevent Ebola from spreading in the U.S. and fighting it in Africa," Hagan said.

Since the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention confirmed the first case of Ebola in the United States on Sept. 30, two more cases have been diagnosed on U.S. soil. The first person who tested positive, Thomas Eric Duncan, died on Oct. 8, and two health care workers who had treated him were also diagnosed. The global death toll has risen to approximately 4,600 as of Wednesday night.

Andrew Brennen, a member of the UNC Young Democrats cabinet, said Hagan's evolving position makes sense because it should be developing along with the Ebola crisis.

"For her to remain stagnant or for her not to change her position as things change on the landscape of the issue would be probably irresponsible," he said.

Around a dozen UNC students surveyed in the Undergraduate Library and the Pit all agreed that neither Hagan's statements on Ebola nor the issue in general would sway their votes.

Gary Pearce, a blogger and Democratic consultant, said in an email that he does not think Hagan's positions on Ebola will affect her campaign.

"Intelligent people change their minds when the facts change."

Bhangra app brings Indian dance to masses

UNC alumni join N.C. State alumni to make smartphone app.

By Morgan Vickers Staff Writer

For anyone watching a Bhangra dance during a celebration of the Indian holiday Diwali this week, the energy, physicality and beauty appear to be skills that take a long time to learn and even longer to perfect.

But a 2012 UNC alumnus and content director of the free Learn Bhangra app, Bianca Bulchandani, doesn't think this is true.

"Anyone that watches this dance knows that the dancers are having much more fun than the audience watching the dance itself," she said. "You can learn that — even if it's just you watching one video a day."

As a freshman, Yeshel Chokshi auditioned for UNC's Bhangra Elite without any experience in the style of dance. Now a junior, Chokshi serves as co-captain for Bhangra Elite, overseeing the organization of choreography, music, props and outfits for each performance. Chokshi said his evolution from a freshman with no experience with Bhangra to his position as captain is a result of hard work and encouragement from his teammates.

"I was one of the only first year guys on the team," he said. "So I pretty much got pushed into competing right off the bat."

Learn Bhangra CEO and 2010 alumnus Lavesh Pritmani spent many years at UNC with Bulchandani performing the same dance and participating in the same group that Chokshi currently leads.

Now, years later, both Bulchandani and Pritmani said the dancing they did at UNC and the education they received served as integral influences in their decision to create the Learn Bhangra app.

Bulchandani was involved in Bhangra Elite as a dancer, and later became more of an adviser.

"I was a business major at UNC," Pritmani said. "So I actually pulled a lot of my marketing slides and just looked at how to identify a target market."

Pritmani said he believes the application is a hybrid of many

"It's a dance of energy, it's a dance that has a rich tradition,"

Bianca Bulchandani Learn Bhangra content director things. Content-wise, Pritmani believes that the application is unlike any other because the Learn Bhangra team not only creates its own content, but also maintains a platform upon which the content can be accessed and shared. Physically, Pritmani says the app is a combination of traditional Punjab influences and a bold, modern background.

"We wanted to keep the Bhangra traditional look intact," Pritmani said. "But we also wanted to give it a fitness element."

Learn Bhangra app is the 30-day workout program designed and taught by Pritmani himself.

"It is one of the most intense dance forms you can do," Pritmani said. "It's such a difficult workout. (Other workouts) don't even compare to how tough the Bhangra workout is."

COURTESY OF THE LEARN BHANGRA APP

UNC alumni Bianca Bulchandani and Lavesh Pritmani are helping develop the Learn Bhangra App, which teaches the traditional Punjabi dance through an intense 30-day workout program.

"Moving at that high level of intensity, at that energy, at that pace," Bulchandani agreed. "It's a way to get moving, to get in shape." As a skilled Bhangra dancer, Chokshi said he believes the Learn Bhangra app is an important way for people to not only to connect with the Punjab culture of India but also to have fun and get in shape.

"It's a dance of pride, it's a dance of energy, it's a dance that has a rich tradition behind it," Bulchandani agreed. "But you don't have to know that to have fun dancing Bhangra."

Judges embark on NC election tour

By Tat'yana Berdan Staff Writer

Four candidates in the upcoming North Carolina judicial elections started a statewide tour in Wilmington on Monday in an attempt to raise awareness about the upcoming election.

There will be four N.C. Court of Appeals races and four N.C. Supreme Court races on the midterm election ballot.

Bob Hunter, N.C. Supreme Court associate justice running for re-election, said the tour is a chance for the candidates to meet with sheriffs, lawyers and residents statewide.

"It's kind of a judicial road trip," he said. "We're having a lot of fun going out meeting people because a lot is happening in North Carolina that's kind of under the radar."

Eric Levinson, N.C. Superior Court judge also running for the state Supreme Court and the main organizer of the trip, said the tour will stop in 19 North Carolina cities and towns and will run through Friday.

He said it is important for state residents to be involved in this year's elections because of the large number of seats open.

Fellow tour member John Tyson, a recall judge on the N.C. Court of Appeals and an emergency Superior Court judge, is one of 19 candidates running for one seat on the Court of Appeals.

"The idea behind the tour is to meet voters and encourage people to take an interest in our judiciary," Levinson said.

Ferrel Guillory, a UNC journalism professor and director of the Program on Public Life, said judicial campaigning is more difficult than other political offices.

He said because judges are bound by their code of ethics to avoid discussing cases that may appear before the court, there is much less opportunity for candidates to differentiate themselves in judicial races. "Judges have power," he said. "But because of the nature of the office, they get much less attention during campaign time."

Mike Robinson, a Winston-Salem lawyer running for Supreme Court, said polling has found that many citizens know little about judicial candidates or elections.

"The judiciary is a coequal branch of government, but the judiciary is probably the least understood branch of government," he said. "It does important work that affects all of the citizens of North Carolina."

The N.C. Association of Educators has also been involved in the elections because of the large impact the judiciary has on education policy, said Mark Jewell, vice president of the NCAE. But they have not endorsed any of the four Republican judiciary candidates on the tour.

Jewell said the group is endorsing a total of eight candidates from both parties in the state Supreme Court and Court of Appeals races.

"We feel that the judicial races are clearly critical to the decisions that are made in effecting the public and students of North Carolina," Jewell said.

The NCAE has filed suits challenging two recent pieces of legislation – a bill to end teacher tenure and a private school voucher program. Jewell said both cases $\bar{d}emonstrate$ how important the judiciary elections are for education.

"We must get involved and we must educate our community about those (judges) that will be fair and nonpartisan," he said.

Levinson said the tour aims to encourage voters to elect judges who are fair and impartial, but Hunter said the tour has also been a fun way to explore North Carolina.

"It's as well organized as a college road trip is," Hunter said. "We're all just kind of off to see the wizard."

Early voting begins today. Students, faculty and staff who are registered to vote and live in Orange County can now vote at North Carolina Hillel, which is located at 210 W. Cameron Ave. For more information about early voting sites, visit the Orange County Board of Elections website at bit.ly/1fyuC6E

ORANGE COUNTY SEATS UP FOR ELECTION

REGISTER OF DEEDS

Mark Chilton

Chilton, 44, is running unopposed for Orange County Register of Deeds. He has been a real estate attorney for 17 years and formerly served as the mayor of Carrboro. Chilton said he would like to make land record information more accessible and make vital records information available online in Spanish.

"The information is provided on the register of deeds website about what you need to do to get the documents you need and there are a lot of people in Orange County who need that information in Spanish," he said.

Charles Blackwood

Blackwood, 54, is running unopposed for Orange County Sheriff.

He has 32 years of experience with the sheriff's department and has held numerous positions including major of operations, the sheriff's second in command. Blackwood said the biggest challenge facing the department is building the next generation of law enforcement.

"We've got people who are 17- and 18-, 19-, 20-year veterans who are getting ready to move on in their careers and possibly retire, and it's a building process for us as we move forward," he said.

CLERK OF COURT

James Stanford

Stanford, 56, is running unopposed for Orange County Clerk of Superior Court.

A 13-year incumbent, Stanford said he is proud of the way the office has served residents during his time as clerk and he hopes to continue to improve. The clerk's office acts as an intermediary between residents and the Orange County judicial system.

"They're going to start with the clerk's office no matter what it might be," Stanford said. "We're involved with criminal matters, we're involved with civil matters."

COMMISSIONER AT-LARGE

Barry Jacobs

A four-term incumbent Jacobs, 63, is running unopposed for the Board of Commissioners' at-large seat. He said the biggest issues facing the county are dealing with the consequences of General Assembly decisions, keeping up with the needs of schools and trying to balance economic development, environmental protection and taxes.

COMMISSIONER SEAT 1

Gary Kahn

Kahn, 58, is a candidate for the Orange County Board of Commissioners District 1 seat. Kahn said he has been vocal in many community issues and previously ran for Chapel Hill Town Council. His priorities include stricter budgeting, education and economic development.

Board of Education, said the county needs to diversify its funding base to provide quality education, human services and environmental protection.

Republican

COMMISSIONER SEAT 2

Earl McKee

Incumbent McKee, 62, is running unopposed to represent District 2 on the Orange County Board of Commissioners. This will be his second term. His priorities include continuing to provide quality education, improving emergency response and encouraging diverse economic development.

Spending and taxes	Does not support the tax reform package passed by the legislature in 2013 because she says it shifts a burden onto middle- and working-class families	Supports the tax reform package passed in North Carolina, but opposes Orange County's current tax structure	Wants to return to a graduated tax structure, with some adjustments from the previous plan, and believes the 2013 tax cuts enacted by the legislature will force more program cuts in the next fiscal year	Intends to reduce the financial impact and tax burden on North Carolina taxpayers	Believes in education and development spending, but would weigh the benefits and costs associated with legislation on all N.C. citizens	Supports cutting government spending, particularly to special interest groups, to cover only the necessities of N.C. citizens — including tax cuts
Jobs and economy	Supports investments in job creation programs that specifically target rural areas of the state	Wants to foster small business creation by removing regulatory barriers to starting businesses	Supports restoring the earned-income tax credit that was eliminated by the wlegislature, and wants to raise the state's minimum wage to move families out of poverty	Wants to create a business-friendly environment in the private sector that will in turn create jobs; supports a simpler tax struc- ture for businesses	Believes in investing in higher education as the basis for a strong economy and supports rural and urban development; also favors incentivizing businesses as economic drivers for smaller towns	Champions all jobs, including the "dirty" ones, and says lack of character, not lack of skill, is why people fail to keep jobs
Environmental issues	Opposes hydraulic fracturing in North Carolina because she considers it to be a serious threat to the safety of the state's drinking water and to ecological habitats	He supports cutting government spending, particularly to special interest groups, to cover only the necessities of N.C. citizens — including tax cuts.	Says she has demonstrated a commitment to protecting the environment while serving in the N.C. House, and doesn't support hydraulic fracturing in North Carolina	Supports exploring opportunities that become available for alternative energy, but doesn't believe the government should subsidize unproven "green" initiatives	Supports the pro- tection of water resources and would encourage partner- ships with develop- ers who believe in conservation; hopes to develop stream buffers and support greenway develop- ment	Supports government investment in alternative energies when the economics coincide, but does not currently believe the economy can support them
Education	Supports some charter schools, but says they need to provide equal access to students from all economic back- grounds; supports universal Pre-K and renewed invest- ments in K-12 and higher education	Opposes the federal Common Core standards; supports increased investment of resources in charter schools and advocates flexibility in charter school education methods	Believes education is the best way to overcome poverty; wants to restore state funding to K-12 education and the UNC system	Supports reforming the current financial aid system used in universities in North Carolina	Supports increasing teacher pay and incentivizing advanced degrees, as well as investing in public K-12 schools, and wants to make higher education more affordable	Wants to tie teacher pay to student performance and other factors measuring educational quality
Health care	Supports Medicaid expansion, and wants to preserve women's access to preventative care	Says the burdens of a broken Medicaid system on N.C. taxpayers are unfair; supports opening a defined- contribution Health Savings Account for state residents	Supports Medicaid expansion, and says North Carolina could forgo $51 billion in federal funding in the next 10 years if the state doesn't expand it	Does not support the Affordable Care Act because he says it is causing large boosts in people's healthcare premium costs	Believes in women's reproductive rights through increased access to healthcare and birth control	Supports repealing the Affordable Care Act
