student athletes also receive help from the Academic Support Program for Student Athletes, part of the Center for Student Success and Academic Counseling.

Harold Woodard, the director of the center, said athletes' support program staff help student athletes schedule classes, though that is not part of their official responsibilities. He said the family and friends of student athletes also play a large role in the class selection process.

Bobbi Owen, who oversees the academic advising program as senior dean for undergraduate education, said students get advice on what classes to take from a variety of places. "I think word of mouth is the most potent one."

Owen said course selection doesn't fall under the purview of the staff of the academic support program for student athletes. "Those professional counselors are not academic advisers."

Woodard said part of the program's mission is to counteract misinformation athletes receive from others who give them advice.

Woodard said since he took over the program in July 2009, it has become more focused on its primary mission of assisting the student athletes, and that advising was not his staff's responsibility.

"The primary (advising) role is held by their Steele Building adviser, and it will remain that way as long as I'm in charge," he said. Jan Yopp, dean of summer school, said the school has implemented changes since the release of the report.

reinstatement requests submitted by the University to the NCAA in 2010 and bills the University received from the Kansas law firm, Bond, Schoeneck & King.

The documents show that the University spent more than $66,000 in outside legal fees from June 2010 until September 2010.

Karen Moon, University spokeswoman, said the University has spent more than $467,000 in outside legal fees since the NCAA investigation began in 2010.

Moon said the documents were redacted to protect confidential information related to students, personnel and the services provided by outside counsel.

Ryan Thornburg, a professor in the UNC School of Journalism and Mass Communication who has worked to make public information available online, said he expects at least some of the redactions in the documents released by the University to be overruled in court.

Amanda Martin, an attorney representing the DTH and other plaintiffs in the lawsuit, submitted a legal brief in which she argues the University should release the records.

In the brief, Martin said the court must decide whether the DTH and other plaintiffs are entitled to copies of documents created by the University during the investigation, copies of the University's written interaction with the NCAA, certain documents and correspondence between the University and its outside counsel, and records of the personal cell phone of Davis.

Martin argues in her brief that the records the University has withheld are business records, rather than educational records, and therefore not protected by FERPA.

Marc Bernstein, special deputy attorney general, submitted a legal brief on Tuesday in support of the defendants, who he listed as Chancellor Holden Thorp, Athletic Director Bubba Cunningham, head football coach Larry Fedora and Director of Public Safety Jeff McCracken.

Bernstein said in the brief that the University has complied with FERPA and that it was right to withhold records of investigations regarding potential misconduct by state employees and communications made within the scope of the attorney-client relationship.

Judge Manning will preside over Thursday's hearing.

"We've got a good indication that this judge will look skeptically at attempts to apply FERPA broadly," LoMonte said.

"Most courts agree that FERPA only applies to educational records that would be kept in a student's permanent record. Records filed with the NCAA would be unlikely to fall into that category."

University spokesman Mike McFarland said the University is not granting interviews related to the lawsuit before the hearing.

Public records requests made to UNC must go through Regina Stabile, director of institutional records and report compliance.

Stabile was out of the office and unavailable for comment. Several other University officials declined to comment on the procedure for handling public records requests.

Bill to help Camp Lejeune victims stalled in Senate

WASHINGTON (MCT) — Thousands of sick Marine veterans and their families may be on the verge of taking a giant leap toward receiving health care for illnesses they suffered from decades of water contamination at Marines Base Camp Lejeune, N.C.

Legislation that has languished for years was expected to be voted on in the full Senate this week under an across-the-aisle deal between the Democratic and Republican leaders of the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee. But a South Carolina senator has blocked the bill, saying he worries about fraud.

Republican Sen. Jim DeMint's stance has developed into an intra-party standoff with Republican Sen. Richard Burr of North Carolina, the Senate bill's lead sponsor, who led the call to help the Marines and their families.

Up to a million people at Camp Lejeune may have been exposed to drinking water that was poisoned with trichloroethylene, tetrachloroethylene, benzene and vinyl chloride. Some medical experts have linked the contamination to birth defects, childhood leukemia and a variety of other cancers.

The bill could effect up to 750,000 Marine veteran and family members.

» Boy Scouts reaffirms ban on gays after secret review

HOUSTON (MCT) — The Boy Scouts of America on Tuesday reaffirmed the organization's policy of excluding gays, despite recent protest campaigns by members, including some of the group's board.

The announcement came after a confidential two-year review by an 11-member special committee formed by Scout leaders in 2010, a spokesman said.

Spokesman Deron Smith, based at the Boy Scouts' headquarters outside Dallas, declined to identify members of the committee, but said in a statement sent to the Los Angeles Times on Tuesday that they represented "a diversity of perspectives and opinions."

According to the statement, the special committee "came to the conclusion that this policy is absolutely the best policy for the Boy Scouts."

As a result of the committee's recommendation, the Boy Scouts' executive board will take no further action on a recently submitted resolution asking for reconsideration of the membership policy, according to the statement.

The Boy Scouts have faced repeated protests concerning the membership policy. On Tuesday, GLAAD highlighted the case of a 19-year-old Missouri Eagle Scout forced to leave his job as a Boy Scout camp counselor after he came out as gay last week.
