It’s called the bear necessities

From staff and wire reports

Apparently, bear cubs also need some serious retail therapy, too.

Last Saturday, a female bear cub walked through the doors at the Sears store in the Pittsburgh Mill Mall in Frazer, Pa. The cub was first sighted around 8:30 p.m. in the parking lot, where people were chasing the bear with their cars. It ran toward the mall.

Officials evacuated all stores, and wildlife conservation officers were called in. They caught the bear between the double doors and shot her with tranquilizers. But the animal was still able to get into the store and wandered around the mall for an hour before finally falling asleep.

Officials still don’t know where the bear came from and haven’t decided what to do with it.

NOTED. Eighteen cops in China worked together to save a sex doll they thought was a drowning woman from a river in Shandong Province. It took officers 40 minutes to rescue the “woman,” and they drew a crowd of about 1,000 spectators anxious to see how the heroic efforts would end. No one knows how the doll ended up in the river.

QUOTED. “Underpants were considered a symbol of male dominance and power.” — Beatrix Nutz, an archaeologist who found four linen bras from the 15th century in an Austrian castle. Up to now, it was widely believed that women didn’t wear anything under their garments during that time period. The find is revolutionary, Nutz said.

CORRECTION

Due to a reporting error, last week’s story “Student: I never met Nyang’oro” incorrectly stated the percentage of student athletes in the AFAM 428 class in summer 2009. The class was 91 percent non-student athletes. The Daily Tar Heel apologizes for the error.
