Batman begins, and promptly ends

From staff and wire reports

If you see a porky man in a Batman suit with pit stains, don't fret — he's not the real deal.

Police in Petoskey, Mich., received a call on May 11 reporting that a man dressed as Batman was found on the roof of a building.

Mark Wayne Williams, 31, was found hanging off the wall of a building in the small town. After police pulled him back onto the roof of the building, they discovered that he was carrying a baton, chemical irritant spray and a pair of lead-lined gloves.

Williams was charged with carrying a gas-ejecting weapon and creating a disturbance, and also had concealed weapons charges. He previously caught the attention of the police by dressing like the Crow, another comic book figure.

NOTED. Jay Rodgers, from Douglasville, Ga., was shot when he tried to teach another man etiquette.

While driving home from a Tim McGraw concert, Rodgers stopped at a gas station, where he opened the door for a man who ignored the gesture.

He demanded a "thank you" from the man, who then pulled a gun and shot him. Rodgers was hospitalized for nine days.

QUOTED. "I want the public to understand it's okay to see a naked man walk down the road."

— Jonathan Palmer, who was arrested for walking naked down a street in Boise, Idaho.

The 20-year-old was not under the influence of drugs or alcohol, but said he wished to conquer his fears of nudity and help the public overcome its fears and taboos as well.

CORRECTIONS

Due to a reporting error, Thursday's page 3 story "FBI affidavit sheds light on case" incorrectly stated that Jeffrey Welty is a UNC law professor. Welty is an assistant professor of public law and government in the UNC School of Government.

The Daily Tar Heel apologizes for the error.

SUNSHINE STUDYING

DTH/ MINHAJ BAQAI
