Students panic over downed CCI

CCI printers were down throughout the day Wednesday.

By Colleen Moir Staff Writer

Students who approached Carolina Computing Initiative printing stations expecting to swipe their UNC One Cards and print assignments were in for an unpleasant surprise Wednesday — the system was down for eight hours during prime class time.

All CCI printers across campus failed beginning around 9 a.m., and the problem was completely resolved around 5 p.m., said Jeremiah Joyner, Teaching and Learning Interactive manager for Information Technology Services.

The failure came from an uncommon communication error between the system that receives student print jobs and the system where students can pay for their print jobs, Joyner said.

"There hasn't been an outage this long for a while," Joyner said.

Other options for printing on campus were available to students, all of which forced them to pay out of pocket for their print jobs during the time that CCI Printing was down.

Signs on the CCI printers in the Undergraduate Library urged students to take their print jobs to the UNC Print Stop, located on the third floor of Student Stores.

"There has been a constant line of customers," Lydia Thompson, a senior and sales associate at the UNC Print Stop said around 3:30 p.m. "It's hard to keep track of them all."

Customers normally send in their orders online and then come in to pick them up, rather than forming a long line at the front desk like the one that was seen Wednesday. "Lots of people have small orders, like two pages for 11 cents, and are charging it to their credit card, so I'm not sure how much profit we're actually making," Thompson said. Glenn Hayslett, assistant head of circulation at Davis Library, said the circulation desk at Davis had also experienced an influx of inquiries.

"(We've gotten questions from) pretty much everyone who comes to print, and that's a lot," Hayslett said.

He said Davis has a guest printer that anyone can use that was working Wednesday, but students had to pay for their print jobs on this printer with money from their expense accounts.

"I feel like the CCI printers never work, and when they do work, they always lag," Sophomore Shantell McLaggan said. "I'm in a lot of classes which require reading, which is a lot of paper. I'm a Covenant Scholar, so I don't have money just to be throwing around."

For NC transfer students, a clearer path to a degree

Nationally, students battle credit transfer policies

By Blair Burnett
Staff Writer

When Carlos Cordero, a 29-year-old junior transfer, came to UNC as a full-time student this fall, he felt welcomed on campus immediately.

Cordero, a staff sergeant in the U.S. Army, transferred from Fayetteville
Technical Community College after completing his associate's degree through the Carolina Student Transfer Excellence Program, which gives students a path through community college to UNC — and ensures they get the credits they need.

"(My adviser) would align what you were taking at Fayetteville Tech with what would transfer over here, so I wouldn't have to take extra classes," Cordero said.

While regional programs like C-STEP are beneficial for students like Cordero, for many transfer students, the transition to UNC — and to other schools nationwide — is not as seamless.

An August study from the National Center for Education Statistics found that 39 percent of transfer students nationwide arrive at their new institution with no transfer credits.

"When there are problems in higher education, we typically blame the institutions," said Sean Simone, the report's author. "It's not the institutions. They, along with students, have a legitimate interest in making the credit transfer process as seamless as possible."

Katie Cartmell, UNC's transfer student retention coordinator, said she does not see problems of credit transfer at UNC on the scale Simone released in his report. But she said the challenges of being a transfer student persist at any university.

"There's such a thing as transfer shock," she said. "It hits students academically and socially, in whatever transfer path they take."

She said the average grade point average of a transfer student before coming to UNC is 3.7, but when students transfer their GPA falls significantly. For junior transfers who come from community colleges or four-year institutions, their average GPA averages around 2.9 by the end of their first year at UNC.

Tomiko Hackett, a UNC senior who transferred as a sophomore from Rutgers University in New Jersey, said her initial transition to UNC was difficult.

"I went to academic advising and other administrators, but I would still walk away feeling really lost," Hackett said. "I really had to advocate for myself as a transfer student, and I feel like other transfers on campus feel the same way."

As an out-of-state student, Hackett said

Cooper initiative targets students

As N.C.'s attorney general weighs a run for governor, he's touring colleges.

By Kate Grise Senior Writer

The average North Carolina college student graduates with nearly $24,000 in debt — and N.C. Attorney General Roy Cooper wants to make sure they know how to manage that burden after graduation.

Cooper kicked off a College Cash and Credit Tour on Sept. 8 at High Point University, speaking to students about becoming smarter consumers.

"Taking the time to learn how to be a smarter consumer now will pay off for years to come," Cooper said at the event, according to a statement from the North Carolina Department of Justice.

Speculation has surrounded Cooper in recent months on his possible run for North Carolina governor in 2016. Ferrel Guillory, a UNC journalism professor and director of the Program on Public Life, said it is relatively clear Cooper has emerged as the leading Democratic opponent of Gov. Pat McCrory.

"His initiative about students and credit cards — he's still the attorney general and he has to do his job," Guillory said. "Doing his job is one of the ways candidates run for office. You build a record."

He said the attorney general's office has had a consumer protection division going back several decades, which advocates for consumers on issues with utility bills, power rates and other consumer troubles.

The tour will continue through five other campuses statewide, including Queens University, Shaw University, East Carolina University, UNC-Pembroke and Cape Fear Community College.

At each stop, experts from the consumer protection division and victims services section will speak with students about managing loan debt, avoiding repayment scams, establishing good credit history and protecting themselves from identity theft.

About 40 students attended the kick-off event at High Point University, which was held in junc-

Renovations delay fraternity hire

Chi Phi will have until January to hire a live-in adviser for its house.

By Jane WesterAssistant University Editor

Chi Phi is renovating its house to provide living quarters for a live-in house director whose presence has been required by national sanctions.

Though the sanctions were imposed by the national Chi Phi fraternity in March, the hiring deadline has now been extended to January 2015 to accommodate for the renovation process.

In the interim, a newly-formed alumni advisory board is providing visible support for Chi Phi members, said a spokesman for the chapter.

"The search is underway, and the renovations have started to ensure the house is in good condition and ready for a full-time live-in resident," the spokesman said.

Aaron Bachenheimer, Director of Fraternity and Sorority Life and Community Involvement, said alumni advisory boards are common for UNC fraternities, but no other fraternity has a live-in house adviser.

Chi Phi's national organization recommended the chapter establish a separate advisory board in addition to the board of its house foundation, a change Bachenheimer said he thinks is a good practice for any fraternity.

The house renovations will include at least one other change.

According to The Richmond Times-Dispatch, police say the man got into his car with the woman, with whom he was planning to travel, then asked for her car keys "so he could put a letter in her vehicle for her to read later." Police said the woman handed over the keys, after which the man asked for a hug and took the opportunity to chop off her long ponytail in the process. Injury research center gets CDC grant

The grant will fund four different projects by UNC researchers.

By Victoria Mirian Staff Writer

A UNC research center has received a maximum grant allowance of $4.5 million from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention − a continuation of funding to conduct four studies about preventing various types of injuries.

The UNC Injury Prevention Research Center applied for the award in the fall of 2013 and received the grant Aug. 1.

The injury center selected four projects that can have an impact on public safety out of about 24 contenders to be included in its proposal, said Steve Marshall, director of the injury center.

"Our theme was to do great research and put it in the hands of people so (the research) can make a difference," Marshall said.

Kevin Guskiewicz, senior associate dean for the natural sciences, and co-principal investigator Jason Mihalik will research safe high school football tackling practices and present their results at high schools in a three-year program, said Guskiewicz, who has previously received CDC funding to research sports injuries.

"This time, I think they viewed this as a unique extension of our ongoing work,"

Another three-year program is being led by Laura Linnan, director of the Carolina Collaborative for Research on Work and Health. Linnan's project, called Beauty is a Balancing Act, will use beauty salons and barber shops to distribute information about injuries from falls and preventative programs.

Linnan believes that spreading information to customers will encourage them to attend fall prevention clinics.

"We know if we get them to participate, it can help them," she said.

UNC health behavior adjunct professor Christopher Ringwalt will look into the prescription drug-monitoring program in the state to determine if recently mandated changes in state law have affected prescription drug abuse.

Robert Foss, a health behavior lecturer, will begin a study in 2017 to see if driver's license laws negatively affect racial minorities and economically disadvantaged teenagers.

"Nobody has taken the bull by the horns and decided to do this before," he said. Foss explained that economically disadvantaged teens might not have a parent figure at home to teach them to drive. "The reason we do this is because we care about adolescent injuries," Foss said. "Researchers are curious about how things works and how things can work better."

UNC's Injury Prevention Research Center is one of three programs at universities around the country that received a grant from the CDC this fall. The University of Pennsylvania received startup funding, while UNC and Johns Hopkins both received comprehensive funding. The UNC research center has been

Tarheel Takeout cashes out

The delivery service no longer accepts cash payments.

By Su Cho Staff Writer

After a Tarheel Takeout manager was robbed at gunpoint, the founders of the popular delivery service have had to evaluate the service's payment options.

The takeout service no longer offers the option to pay with cash. Tarheel Takeout delivers food to students from restaurants that do not offer delivery services.

The company's founders, Wes Garrison and Charles Douthitt, said the well-being and safety of the drivers was one reason for the removal of the cash payment option. The founders said there have not been any other safety incidents.

Garrison and Douthitt also made the choice to stop accepting cash because they said it was timeconsuming, expensive and difficult to track.

"Often customers at the door wouldn't have cash or enough cash," Garrison said. "It was frustrating for the drivers."

Garrison and Douthitt tested the change, finding that most customers actually used their credit cards instead of cash anyway.

Garrison said the change hasn't affected business.

"In the beginning we were scared of how much of our business would go away, but statistically we have not lost any business," he said.

They did receive a small number of complaints, mostly from older people, but according to Garrison and Douthitt, there were a larger number of people who were happy with the change.

Most of the restaurants associated with Tarheel Takeout were not affected by the new policy.

Parker Emmerson, office manager at Mediterranean Deli, said he hadn't noticed any change in business but that he personally is against the policy.

"Not speaking for the restaurant, but on a personal standpoint, by not accepting cash, we are moving towards a cashless society in general, which places more government control and restrictions on personal finance," Emmerson said.

Laura Rolleri, shift manager at The Loop Pizza Grill, did not know about Tarheel Takeout's new policy at all. She said it hasn't affected business at The Loop.

We get at least 100 or more orders a week from Tarheel Takeout," she said.

Neither The Loop nor Mediterranean Deli offer other delivery options, and neither managers said they had received complaints about Tarheel Takeout no longer offering cash.

Freshman Layla Namak has never used Tarheel Takeout but knows about the services the company

"If I ever wanted to, I'd still use Tarheel Takeout," Namak said.

"The no-cash policy does not affect me at all. I guess it would only be difficult when you are ordering with multiple people and you want to split the bill in cash."

Both Garrison and Douthitt believe this change in policy makes Tarheel Takeout more efficient and "We can deliver our orders faster and more correctly," Garrison said. We changed so we can give better service instead of spending time doing things like counting money."

SOUTHERN SMASH A HIT

Students smashed scales to challenge body image issues

By Tyler Fleming Staff Writer

Students attacked eating disorders with sledgehammers and baseball bats outside Davis Library Wednesday afternoon.

Participants in Southern Smash, an event held to raise awareness for social stigmas surrounding body image and support organizations at UNC, were invited to write down negative opinions of themselves, tie them to balloons and let them go. Students then used bats and hammers to demolish personal McCall Dempsey, the founder of Southern Smash, said the group's mission was not solely to raise awareness of disorders but also to promote self-confidence.

"Our mission is to bring attention to not only eating disorders but also positive body image as well," Dempsey said.

Organizers invited participants to reflect on what oppresses them and what they love about themselves.

Between 10 and 20 percent of college-aged women and four and 10 percent of collegeaged men suffer from eating disorders in America and more suffer from poor body image, according to Embody Carolina, a UNCbased eating disorder support group.

The event was sponsored by Carolina House, the UNC Center of Excellence for Eating Disorders, Embody Carolina and the UNC Panhellenic Council. The groups also held an informational dialogue with students.

Senior Chloe Paterson thought UNC students would be especially susceptible to eating disorders.

"Carolina students face a lot of pressure to be perfect, and that doesn't help," she said. Stephanie Zerwas, assistant research professor for the UNC Center of Excellence for Eating Disorders agreed, saying college students can be prone to developing a disorder.

For much of the event, nearly all of the Southern Smash participants were female, though organizers emphasized that men can also develop a disorder.

"A common misconception is eating disorders only affect rich, vain, white girls. Eating disorders do not discriminate; people of all backgrounds struggle," Zerwas said. "A lot of guys are out there struggling with eating disorders but have no one to turn to or feel like they are the only ones."

Sophomore Mackensie Kvalvik, a Zumba fitness instructor, said body image is a universal issue.

"Everyone has thought their body wasn't good enough," she said.

On-campus support options include Embody Carolina, which trains students on how to help friends with eating disorders, and the Center of Excellence for Eating Disorders, which treats victims and conducts research on biological factors that lead to the disorders.

McCall was satisfied with how the event

"If we have planted a seed of hope, then we have done our job," McCall said.

Hughes, defense looking for a second chance

It's been almost a year since East Carolina stunned the Tar Heels.

By Pat James

Assistant Sports Editor

Travis Hughes, North Carolina senior outside linebacker, sat on the bleachers at Navy Field Wednesday following practice holding his helmet in his hands.

With his facemask not hiding most of his face like it typically does, the lone senior of the UNC linebacking corps spoke to the media — flashing his signature energetic smile.

But with the mere mention of 2013's game against East Carolina, a 55-31 trouncing by the Pirates at Kenan Memorial Stadium, Hughes' grin disappears, his brow furrows.

Hughes led the UNC defense against ECU with nine total tackles, two for a loss. But UNC's overall performance — specifically the defense's — wiped away his smile on that day, too. "I can't even try to take credit for anything as far as tackling, because we lost," Hughes said. "And at the end of the day, stats don't matter in that game after you see that scoreboard."

Now, with a chance for revenge looming, the UNC defense needs energy, specifically from Hughes, to contain the high-octane ECU offense in Greenville Saturday.

Ron West, a co-defensive coordinator and linebackers coach, said Hughes' ability to energize the defense is crucial for UNC, which has forced nine turnovers thus far.

"He's a very competitive guy, very hard-nosed. He's a physical player," West said. "He brings what I call a great energy to our football team. A very positive energy, and a very hard-nosed energy.' In 2013's showdown, UNC lacked that energy, as the Pirates' offense amassed 603 total yards the second most ever allowed by the Tar Heels in Kenan — on 101 plays, the most plays an opposing team has ever run against UNC. Linebacker Jeff Schoettmer said the Pirates' pure domination in all phases was due to UNC coming out flat and unfocused.

Schoettmer said Hughes' vivacity is vital to avoid the same blunders from plaguing the team on the road.

"Travis is one of those guys that

Travis Hughes, the lone senior linebacker on the North Carolina football team, hopes to quell an ECU offense that scored 55 points against UNC in 2013.

just brings energy in everything he does, whether it's in the weight room, on the field, anything," he said. "You can watch him during game day and during pre-game warmups hitting his head, jumping around and getting everyone fired up."

UNC faces the tough task of limiting ECU quarterback Shane Carden, who recorded 427 passing yards and three touchdowns last week against then No. 17 Virginia Tech.

While many doubt the UNC defense, which ranks 89th nationally against the pass, Hughes is confident. The same smile returns.

"Playing ECU, that rivalry we have and being looked at as we are right now is a great position," Hughes said. "I feel like as a senior, that's my priority right now — to make sure everybody's out here and ready to go."

Hungry students find help at TABLE

By Morgan Swift Staff Writer

Hundreds of Chapel Hill-Carrboro elementary school students do not have to worry about going hungry on the weekends, thanks to the nonprofit organization TABLE.

TABLE's Weekend Meal Backpack program, which feeds students in need, begins again today. About 31 percent of Chapel Hill-Carrboro elementary school children receive subsidized school lunches and breakfasts.

For those children, that usually means going hungry on weekends.

TABLE's goal is provide healthy and nutritious food to students in need, said Ashton Chatham Tippins, TABLE's executive director.

"One of our big goals is to serve 325 kids each week," Tippins said.

TABLE served 12 students during the first week of the Weekend Meal Backpack program when it launched in 2008, said Laura Moore, TABLE's program director.

TABLE has expanded its reach to more after school centers and nonprofit organizations this year, Tippins said. As of now, the organization serves four local elementary schools and hopes to serve as many as seven in the future.

The number of families receiving food and nutrition services more than doubled between 2008 and 2014, according to data compiled by the Chapel Hill-Carrboro Chamber of Commerce.

TABLE gets connected to students in need through elementary schools, afterschool programs and organizations like Empowerment Inc., which helps people find affordable housing options.

Sarita Nwachukwu, head of community programs at Empowerment Inc., said they serve as a liaison between students in need and TABLE.

"We work with a lot of low-income families through our community outreach program," she said. "A lot of our tenants meet the criteria for free or subsidized lunch."

Empowerment has been able to connect TABLE with 10 students in need this school year, Nwachukwu said.

"I know parents have been really excited about the quality of the food," Nwachukwu said. "The kids are able to eat well over the weekend."

The Weekend Meal Backpack program and SnackChef, another TABLE initiative, have helped students discover healthy foods they can add to their diets.

Moore said TABLE's SnackChef program teaches kids to try healthy new foods. The program sends volunteers to after-school programs where they teach kids how to prepare simple, healthy snacks. Later, the children are sent home with the ingredients.

Most of the food comes from donations of nonperishable goods, Moore said. Maple View Farm and the Carrboro Farmers' Market donate items to the students, Moore said.

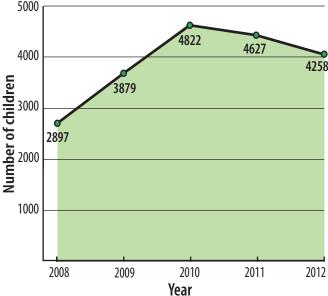

Tippins said one of the most heartwarming memories she has from her work with TABLE is from last winter during a snowstorm.

'We were trying to distribute a lot of food quickly because school would be canceled for a few days," Tippins said. "We went to one apartment, and the little girl turned to her sister and said, 'See, I told you they would come."

"I hope that they realize that it is okay and good to rage to banjo music on Thursday night," said Patrick Dyer Wolf, one of Goodnight, Texas's lead singers.

Wolf formed the selfdescribed "garage-Appalachian" quartet in 2011 while maintaining a long-term musical collaboration with fellow singer Avi Vincour between San Francisco and Chapel Hill. The band was officially born when the singers found a town exactly halfway between their homes called Goodnight, Texas.

Wolf spent four years playing in and around Chapel Hill before moving to New York, but he always focused on developing his sound with Vincour. The band's sound is derived from garage rock and acoustic folk, a mixture Wolf said creates a heavy bluegrass vibe.

"We started as a duo doing Simon & Garfunkel-type harmonies on acoustic songs," Wolf said. "We don't play any electric guitars, but we try to hit hard if we can with our banjos and our acoustic guitars.'

Goodnight, Texas' new album "Uncle John Farquhar" was released in August, and Wolf said the band is looking forward to playing new songs including "Button Your Wolf said he and Vincour are excited to bring their music to Chapel Hill and plan on returning in the near future.

On new AP US History curriculum, a pushback

By Corey Risinger Staff Writer

High school students get testing anxiety — and, this fall, they're not the only ones sweating with the implementation of a new Advanced Placement U.S. History curriculum.

The College Board created the new framework in response to teacher concerns that the old curriculum didn't allow for in-depth discussion. But critics take issue with the revamped course's content and the private organization's authority over state education.

'The College Board has been a monopoly for 100 years," said Jane Robbins, senior fellow at the American Principles Project. "Why do we have to cower before the College Board because they're there and have an office in New York?' According to the College Board, the newly designed AP U.S. History course will emphasize analysis and interpretation of primary sources and legal documents.

"We believe that it strikes a careful balance between teaching factual knowledge and critical analysis," wrote the authors of the AP U.S. History curriculum in an open letter addressing the claims against them.

But the Republican National Committee said the framework devalues integral information.

"It reflects a radically revisionist view of American history that emphasizes negative aspects of our nation's history, while omitting or minimizing positive aspects," wrote the RNC in an Aug. 8 resolution.

Robbins said the conversation has put pressure on College Board to communicate with critics.

The N.C. State Board of Education has not discussed a similar proposal. "As recently as the very beginning of this month, our board chairman said that the board was not considering taking any action," said Sara Clark, spokeswoman for the N.C. Department of Public Instruction.

Peter Wood, president of the National Association of Scholars, said the College Board transitioned from a view of American exceptionalism to one embracing more diverse perspectives.

"The history of America is told largely through the lens of the injustices perpetrated on various people at various times by the American elite: generally rich white men," he

Wood said the new AP U.S. History framework puts little emphasis on important epic history, diminishing it so that a student could walk away from the course with little knowledge of American history. The old curriculum allowed for greater teacher flexibility and unique teaching methods, he said, though the RNC's resolution is not the solution.

"Where there are contending interpretations, (we should) give students access to the facts, the documents and broader narratives and allow students to make up their own minds," Wood said.

professor at UNC, said facts are important, but critical thinking is fundamental in college level courses. Watson said that, ultimately, the RNC's critique of the curriculum is uninformed. "You can't bake a cake without ingredients, and you can't leave out people and events from a history class any more than you can leave out sugar and flour from a cake," he said. Myra Waheed, a UNC freshman, said the old framework was narrow in its perspective. "So we didn't get much of an international look," she said. "I don't think it was negative, I just think it was very present and very domestic."

Dancing or standing still, still entertaining

Figures in Carrboro and Chapel Hill connect with street-goers.

By Margaret Gilmore Staff Writer

From magic tricks to trashcan drumming, the streets of Chapel Hill and Carrboro are constantly bustling with entertainment.

One of Chapel Hill's most notable entertainers, "C Ray," is most commonly known for posing as a human statue in front of Krispy Kreme Doughnuts on Franklin Street.

"I don't know what happens down the street, but as long as you leave with a smile on your face, I'm happy," he said. C Ray said he started performing on the streets while living in New Orleans in 2000. Homeless and seeking work, C Ray asked a street performer on Bourbon Street how to make some money. The busker told him simply to stand on a milk crate and not move.

As people began to walk by and throw change, the human statue was born, and C Ray decided he would make a living off of busking in different cities.

"If you treat it like a hustle, it's a hustle," C Ray said. "If you treat it like an art, it'll be

While people typically walk by without really paying attention, C Ray often comes to life, creating an element of surprise.

"It's entertainment you wouldn't expect,"

Children on Franklin Street often tug at his clothes and question if he's real, C Ray

Offering a different style of entertainment, Bruce Thomas has made a name for himself as the "Dancing Man of Carrboro." But Thomas said when he first came to Carrboro, he didn't dance. It wasn't until one Thursday evening in 2002 that he found his inspiration.

As he sat on a bench in front of Weaver Street Market, Thomas noticed a group of kids dancing around a tree with a friend of his who shared the same yoga philosophies. Wanting to dance with the kids, Thomas said he looked to God for guidance. He said the Lord said for him to practice what he preached and face his fears.

After much hesitation, Thomas proceeded to walk slowly towards the tree, and his body started moving.

Twelve years later, Thomas can still be found dancing most mornings and evenings in the same spot in front of Weaver Street

"The greatness of dancing is the flow of energy or the space that you can get into and how you can uplift your own spirits," he said.

In the summer of 2006, Thomas' dancing came to an abrupt halt as Car Mill Mall banned him from dancing in front of Weaver Street Market. Community members of both Carrboro and Chapel Hill responded by organizing protests to bring Bruce back in a campaign known as "Let Bruce Dance." After three months of controversy, then ban was lifted and Thomas went back to his daily dancing routine.

"I think he's fascinating and inspiring, and I have actually incorporated his philosophies into my own canon," said senior economics major Evan Comen.

After many years, Thomas has chosen to remain on the Carr Mill Mall property because he finds there is a lot of ancient energy in the ground that attracts people from all over.

"My whole purpose of doing what I do in life is to spread peace, love and joy, and that's why I do everything that I do."

Buskers bring harmony to Franklin

By Clayton Johnson Staff Writer

Whether it's smooth saxophone outside the Ackland Museum Store or drums in the nook of Julian's, local musicians are using Franklin Street

Buskers — entertainers who perform on the street for money — use these small gigs as an opportunity to forward their music. Chapel Hill resident Matt Phillips is a professional singer-songwriter who got his start playing in front of Spanky's Restaurant & Bar at age 18.

"I went out on the street and just waited for people to give me money," he said. "I'd think to myself what I was doing when they gave me money. A lot of that was playing 'Wagon Wheel,' a thousand times." Phillips said he didn't depend on busking to live back then, but it helped him tune his sound and perfect his skills that led to a professional career. He said that on a good night busking in Chapel Hill, he's made as much as $350.

"Playing what people like is the most gratifying feeling in the world," he said. "Looking at someone's face and watching it light up because of what you're doing, especially when it's by you and you're just playing guitar."

On the opposite side of Franklin Street, J. Alphonse Nicholson beats buckets outside the Ackland Museum Store.

"I started drumming on the street about two years ago," Nicholson said. "It was something I was always interested in and tried in Chapel Hill first, and I got an overwhelming response from students and people here."

When he's not playing buckets, Nicholson is a professional actor who has performed four times with PlayMakers Repertory Company and in New York City. Wherever he goes, he takes his buckets with him.

When I first got (to New York), I went to a hardware store, bought two buckets and a bowl and started playing out on the street. That first day I made $600, and it was nuts."

But Nicholson doesn't do it for the money.

"It's all about entertaining people, about making someone's day better just with the sound of music," he said. "I think this area deserves good artists, and it's awesome they give us the privilege to hang out and play music."

Jeffrey York, the Public and Cultural Arts Administrator of Chapel Hill, said he supports street musicians and hopes they come to the 140 W. Franklin Plaza.

"I think street musicians add to the ambiance of the town," he said.

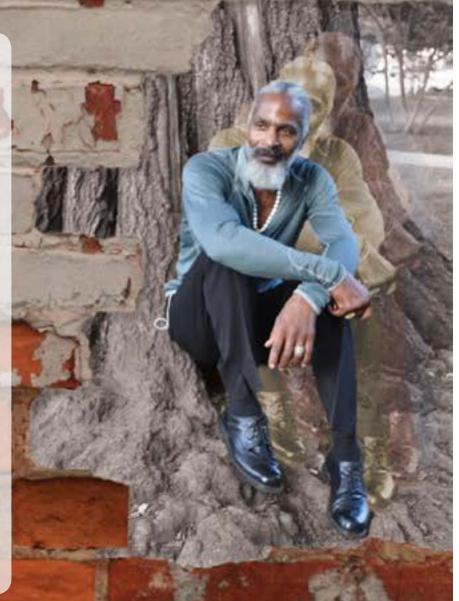

The Ackland Museum Store has noticed artists like Nicholson outside the store, and they're not upset about the noise.

"It's just kind of a fun community thing, and I don't think it's a deterrent to our customers or anything like that," assistant manager Melinda Rittenhouse said. It just sort of livens up the corner. I've seen probably a good corner for them. I think it's kind people dancing or talking to the musicians, so it's she felt especially lost in the transfer process, only finding help within the Carolina Covenant Scholars program.

For students transferring from community colleges within North Carolina, the state's Comprehensive Articulation Agreement ensures students completing an associate's degree and obtaining at least a 2.0 GPA will meet the minimum requirements to be accepted into one of the 16 UNC-system universities.

As of this semester, the 1997 policy was revised to define a general education core — courses that students can transfer from any of the state's 58 community colleges to any UNC-system school.

"North Carolina has done a great job of creating a regional policy for transfer students," Simone said. "But, there is a national need for more regional policies protecting and advocating for transfer students."

He said articulation agreements need to be developed on a national level.

"We really need to make sure that, in the case of transfer students, different states are working with one another to help what's most important in this situation — the students," he said.

Tracy Mancini, dean of the Arts, Sciences and University Transfer department at Durham Technical Community College, said she doesn't see many students with large credit issues because of the policies North Carolina has in place.

But Mancini added that it isn't the same nationwide.

"There is a national call right now to ease the burden of transfer students," she said. Janet Marling, executive director of the National Institute for the Study of Transfer Students, said a national agreement would be a good goal — but given that many states and regions are having trouble passing effective policies, this goal is

"We need to look at the application of credit transfer to make progress because if you're pursuing any academic goal and your credits don't transfer, you're not making any progress," Marling said.

It's important, she said, for new and revised policies to be inclusive of all transfer student populations.

"Out-of-state students have a tough time because when transferring to an institution in another state, these localized articulation agreements, no matter how great they are, don't apply," she said.

At UNC, transfer students still face obstacles, even with access to special groups and communities, such as the Transfer United LivingLearning Community and the Tar Heel Transfer Student Organization.

Hackett said course registration is often biased against transfers, as each student is assigned a registration time based on the number of hours they have completed before and while attending UNC.

"Every semester I find myself registering for classes days after other individuals in my grade are registering," Hackett said. "I've had really hard times getting into some classes I need for my major because of this rule."

Some students in North Carolina, and many more nationwide, continue to struggle in the transfer process, Mancini said.

"North Carolina has been attentive to the need of transfers, and this is something other regions and the nation can take notice of."

tion with a business class. Pam Haynes, spokeswoman for High Point University, said students participated in a Q&A with Cooper during the event.

"It was a great experience for our students to be able to see a state official of his caliber one on one and spend some time with him," she said.

Cooper is focusing on an issue that's important for students, said Wilson Parker, president of the UNC Young Democrats and director of state and external affairs for UNC Student Government.

"He's been an advocate for students," Parker said. "It's exciting that he's working on that initiative."

Though the initiative is part of Cooper's attorney general duties, Guillory said it doesn't hurt Cooper's political aspirations, since college students are a vocal part of the voting block.

"There's political motivation around everything, and so it is in his interest to energize young people and keep them within the democratic constituency," Guillory said. "It seems to me like that kind of an initiative isn't sort of a flagwaving type thing that would get you a bunch of voters, but it keeps him in touch with a segment of the electorate."

While Parker agreed Cooper's campaign is primarily linked to his attorney general work, he said it is encouraging that an official who is looking out for students' interests is demonstrating intent to run.

"As a student, I think that seeing a politician who is actively interested in standing up for student needs instead of doing the opposite, which is what we see so much of in Raleigh these days, definitely means a lot."

Trainings around campus

Helping Advocates for Violence Ending Now, or HAVEN, is a campus organization that educates students on sexual and interpersonal

The group works to train members of the Chapel Hill community to support victims of sexual or interpersonal violence, according to its web site.

Often people who have suffered from these acts feel as though they do not have anyone to talk to, so HAVEN serves to eliminate this problem.

HAVEN offers 3-hour training for students, faculty and staff. They also offer refresher courses for those who have previously been educated to help prevent sexual violence but want to stay updated.

The goal of the training is to teach members to listen actively, respond with empathy and link victims to resources available on campus that could help them.

Junior Julia Stroup, who did the training in fall 2013, said the program taught her concrete skills to help her friends.

"I think the most important part of HAVEN for me was learning practical ways to be able to support my friends and those around me who are experiencing serious things," she said. "You learn how to be a good active listener and connect survivors with different resources on campus."

"HAVEN was my first step in the door on these issues," said Stroup, who has since become a One Act Peer Educator and violence prevention intern for Student Wellness.

Rethink: Psychiatric Illness

Rethink: Psychiatric Illness is a student-run organization on campus hoping to open up a discussion about mental illness. It started as a living-learning community in the fall of 2011 and became a Campus Y committee in April of 2012.

Its aim is to make UNC a safe place for students to share their experiences regarding mental illness. The group offers 4-hour sensitization trainings that review the basics of mental health and hope to destigmatize mental illness. The goals of the training are to make people feel encouraged and open to have a conversation regarding mental health.

Taylor Swankie, a senior majoring in health policy and management and one of the founding members of the organization, has been with Rethink since it started in fall of 2011 and has since then personally seen the organization thrive.

'Carolina students are very caring and compassionate," Swankie said. "They want to support this safe place to discuss mental illness so we want to give them the tools to do that."

Swankie said one of the initial goals of the organization was to have a few training sessions and to alert the community that Rethink exists.

"I never expected that there would be this much interest from students to talk about mental illness. I have been very fortunate in seeing how much the culture and the environment of this campus has changed in respect to mental illnesses."

One Act

One Act is an on-campus organization that focuses on educating students on how to prevent interpersonal violence in social situations.

The organization serves as skill training to intervene when students see the potential for interpersonal violence to occur. ACT is also an acronym for "asking for help, creating a distraction or talking directly."

The overall goal of One Act is to make the UNC community and safer place for all of its residents and members. In 2010, UNC adopted a bystander approach to its training, said Katrina Hauprich, a peer educator.

'This bystander strategy approaches students as allies and potential leaders, rather than potential perpetrators or victims, and has been shown to alter social norms and promote pro-social and respectful behavior," she said. One Act is composed of three committees: Peer

Education, Events, and Public Relations. As a whole. these three committees raise awareness for the program, conduct training, and arrange events to gather the attention of UNC students.

In the spring of 2013, One Act added a new program, One Act for Greeks, meant to improve safety in fraternities and sororities.

Hauprich said the accumulation of small acts could lead to a significant reduction of violence on campus.

We hope that through training, participants will gain the willingness and confidence to take just one action, leading to a reduction in violence on campus," she said.

Safe Zone

Safe Zone is an organization that serves to train people to act as accepting companions to students with varying sexual orientations, gender identities and gender expressions.

The organization trains not only students but also faculty and staff to make campus a more inviting place for everyone.

Safe Zone hopes to provide students with a safe and inviting campus environment, regardless of their sexual or gender backgrounds.

'The purpose of Safe Zone is to create a network of allies that people can talk to about sexual orientation, gender identity and gender expression," the organization's web site says.

Safe Zone holds trainings throughout the year, and allies who participate receive a sticker to display in their offices or living spaces.

Adrianne Gibilisco, the administrative support specialist for Safe Zone, said that it helps train faculty as well as students.

We do special departmental trainings at UNC, as well as at other schools and health organizations, so our reach in creating allies is expanding all the time," she said.

Gibilisco said the organization began in 2000. "That was when Marcie Fisher-Borne was hired as the first employee with any LGBT responsibility at UNC-Chapel Hill," she said. The LGBT office opened three years later in 2003 and is now the LGBTQ Center.

Embody Carolina

Compiled by staff writer Mona Bazzaz.

Embody Carolina provides students with the tools to assist people suffering from eating disorders. The program began in 2011.

Eating disorders are a complex and dangerous psychological disease that people often do not know how to approach. Friends and peers of those struggling try to help but are not educated on the correct ways to do so. Embody Carolina was created in order to properly teach people how to help those with eating disorders. Colleen Daly is a UNC graduate and one of the founding members of Embody Carolina. She and her friend Ben Barge were both personally connected to eating disorders, she said, and that inspired them to start the organization. "The best thing about Embody is that it created a conversation about a prevalent issue that was too often thrown under the rock," Daly said.

"One of the very important aspects of the Embody Carolina program is that a medical professional is present at every one of the meetings."

This is to ensure the medical well-being of participants who might have an eating disorder.

Daly added that working with Embody Carolina has been rewarding for her to know the impact that she has made on peoples lives.

"I got a letter from someone that I had used the Embody training on, and she said that had helped save her life," Daly said.

Green Zone

Green Zone provides training for faculty and staff members who want to learn more about the issues and concerns facing veteran or other military students.

Brian Papajcik, assistant dean of students, is highly involved in Green Zone. He said Green Zone trains faculty and staff to help students dealing issues such as transitioning from military culture to higher education culture, transferring credits or understanding the GI Green Zone ultimately aims to create a visible network and culture of care and understanding for military affiliated students. The organization hopes to figure out what the needs of these students are and how to help them. "We're not expected to be experts who can solve every problem that they encounter," Papajcik said. We are really supposed to be individuals who can lend a sympathetic ear and help veterans and other military students identify and connect with the appropriate Papajcik said he hopes in semesters to come they can extend their professional staff and faculty members on campus who want to assist military students. Veteran students often say they do not know who to talk to or who to go to on campus, so Green Zone is hoping to Green Zone now has over 100 faculty and staff members have been trained. They typically have five training sessions a semester.

Rock is not dead, Gene Simmons ock is finally dead." Gene Simmons, eternal tonguewagger and bassist for KISS, made this seemingly brash claim in a recent interview with Esquire, leaving the music community staggering.

Simmons' declaration of rock's death came as an immense affront to my personal ethos. Raised on the Gospel of Hard Rock, I believe in the power of loud guitars and fast drums. An inquiry into my favorite song is an exploration of my entire personality and worldview. To put it simply, rock music is who I am.

His argument, though, is more nuanced than the headlines. Simmons rules the death a murder: the result of illegal downloading and file-sharing.

Ultimately, Simmons blames file-sharing on a lack of patriotism. He conflates good citizenship with support of capitalist values, i.e., the legal purchase of music for the profit of artists.

Regardless of his political and fiscal opinions, Simmons' thoughts reflect the truth of the mainstream music industry: it is dominated by mindless, synthetic dance-pop.

Major label executives produce and promote what sells. For whatever reason, our generation would rather rage to a poorly constructed Avicii anthem than engage in the glory of a well-written and emotionally evocative track.

Simmons goes on to lament the absence of craft.

"You're better off not even learning how to play guitar or write songs and just singing in the shower and auditioning for 'The X Factor," he said.

My issue with Simmons' argument stems from his total disregard for independent artists and labels. Though not as prevalent on mainstream radio and media outlets, independent artists maintain their authenticity and credibility by refusing to adopt major label values.

Independent rock labels including 4AD, Rough Trade, Sub Pop and Merge have launched and maintained the careers of, among others, The Pixies, The Strokes, Nirvana and Arcade Fire, respectively.

As an intern with Durhambased Merge Records, I can personally attest to the flourishing output of independent artists.

Whether it's the soaring chorus of Arcade Fire's "Wake Up," the oft-replicated soft/ loud/soft song structure pioneered by The Pixies (hear: "Where is My Mind") or the melodic rasp of Kurt Cobain in "About a Girl," the spiritual influence of independent artists cannot be overestimated.

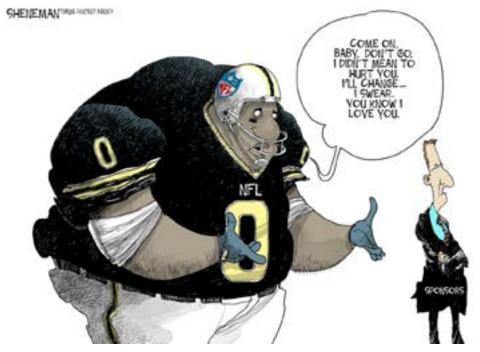

The idea of indie rock as a historic or fleeting concept is an illusion. Hundreds of talented artists play in the Triangle, from Raleigh's Hopscotch Music Festival to shows at Cat's Cradle.

I highly encourage any person who considers herself a supporter of quality music to legally purchase her favorite albums and attend local shows.

Rock lives and breathes through the musicians, producers, managers, label execs and lowly interns like myself who dedicate their lives to its existence. As long as kids are willing to spend their allowance on Marshall amps and hours learning the "Smoke on the Water" riff, rock music will never die.

Tillis wrong for women

Tillis' plan won't help women pay for birth control.

orth Carolina voters should not be fooled by North Carolina House Speaker Thom Tillis' (R) political ploy to support over-thecounter birth control medication.

While this position appears to favor women's rights by simplifying access, such an action would shift the cost of birth control from insurance companies to women. Because Tillis' platform rejects the Affordable Care Act's stipulation that insurance cover the cost of birth control, the move to designate birth control as an over-thecounter drug could increase out-of-pocket costs.

Should contraceptives become over-the-counter, costs could increase by $600 per year, according to Planned Parenthood, for women who currently have the cost of contraceptives as well as annual "wellwoman" office visits covered under the Affordable Care Act. Planned Parenthood is a medical organization that advocates for women's health issues and abortion rights.

The predicted increase would make these medications too costly for many women. This comes at a time when almost a quarter of women have more trouble paying for contraceptives than in the past, according to a recent survey.

That Tillis' change in position has come so late in the election season would be an unlikely coincidence. His legislative record is full of instances of opposition to reproductive rights. In 2011, as speaker of the house, Tillis oversaw the passage of a budget provision that attempted to cut state funding to Planned Parenthood. This provision was later blocked by a federal judge.

Tillis also presided over State Bill 353, which placed restrictions on health clinics that perform abortions. In addition, it barred women from using government-administered insurance to pay for abortions, forcing them to pay out of pocket. S.B. 353 was originally designed to deal with motorcycle safety, but abortion-related amendments were added without public notice.

Planned Parenthood has called attention to the similarity in shift of position of Tillis and state Rep. Cory Gardner of Colorado (R), both of whom use the same consulting firm, OnMessage, to advise their campaigns, according to Politico.

With the election less than two months away and recent polls showing Tillis trailing his opponent by several points, Tillis appears to be making a last-ditch effort to garner votes among a voting bloc that would otherwise favor Democratic incumbent Kay Hagan. While Tillis may be talking an excellent political game, the authenticity of his commitment to women's health should remain in question.

Efforts to reframe the cost of reproductive rights as a private instead of public health issue have made inroads recently. For religious reasons, private companies are no longer required to provide a full array of contraceptives to be a part of their health care plan, according to the Supreme Court ruling in the case of Burwell v. Hobby Lobby Stores, Inc.

Tillis voiced support for the court ruling. "Although today was a loss for Kay Hagan, Barack Obama and the Washington bureaucrats who want to run our lives, the American people are the clear winners," he said, according to The (Raleigh) News & Observer.

As more companies are given the ability to opt out of federal mandates to control the accessibility of contraceptives, the issue of payment becomes increasingly privatized

In this context, sudden support for over-the-counter birth control makes economic sense for Tillis' agenda — with the added benefit of fooling women into thinking he has their best interests at heart.

Making birth control over-the-counter takes down one barrier between women and contraception but erects in its place a more formidable one of excessive cost.

It remains the responsibility of legislators — and those who elect them to continue the fight to make reproductive health services and medications affordable and widely available to all women.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

SGA and advocacy roles can be separate

TO THE EDITOR:

The student government of UNC represents all students. That's why it's so important for the student government to be nonpartisan — fighting for the interests of all Carolina students, not just this or that political party.

Many Carolina students who are interested in and active in politics - including both of us — also serve the student body as officers in the student government.

Together, we lead a team that advocates to the legislature, in a non-partisan fashion, on behalf of students and the University.

We do not apologize for our political beliefs or our political advocacy. But we will always keep them separate from our service in the student government.

On some occasions, The Daily Tar Heel has identified Wilson, who leads our team, in his student government role when he was speaking on behalf Young Democrats. This inappropriately implied that he was speaking on behalf of student government when he was not.

We understand that Daily Tar Heel journalists are just trying to give readers a fuller sense of what is going on. We have asked that The Daily Tar Heel differentiate between separate roles, but this has proved difficult.

We are writing now to ensure every Carolina student that we, within our roles in student government, strive to be profescional and non-nar Our main priority within student government is to further the interests of Carolina students.

As the person directly responsible for UNC Student Government's advocacy to the legislature, it concerns us deeply that Mr. Parker would sign such a letter.

In conversations with Mr. Parker, he told us that he did not mean for his Student Government credentials to be present, but it is still concerning to us that he submitted an endorsement to begin with. As the person whose job it is to advocate for Student Government to the North Carolina General Assembly, we do not believe that it is appropriate for him to so publicly oppose those he would be expected to work with.

After this episode, we do not have confidence in Mr. Parker's ability to effectively advocate for student interests. It is our opinion that he should step down effective immediately so that a new Director can be appointed who is more able to advocate for students.

Attention must be paid to all survivors

TO THE EDITOR:

We commend The Daily Tar Heel for featuring a story about male survivors of sexual assault on the front page of Monday's paper.

While the article highlights weaknesses in our university's response to male survivors of sexual assault, the exposure of this problem shows that our campus community is taking steps to end sexual violence and support all survivors.

Survivors of sexual violence face shame and stigma, and male survivors can experience this to a greater extent because of our society's expectations of men.

We are confident that Counseling and Psychological Services can survivors to get the help they need. We hope that CAPS will address the individual needs of male survivors and include them in male or co-ed support groups.

The number of male survivors seeking support may be small, but providing the opportunity for all people to identify with other survivors in their own community is worth taking an extra step.

Project Dinah, an interpersonal and sexual violence prevention organization, welcomes all survivors and allies, regardless of gender identity or personal experience with sexual violence.

We encourage anyone who is interested to attend our meetings on Mondays at 7 p.m. in Dey Hall. We also invite survivors. secondary survivors, or allies to share their experiences on our anonymous blog, speakoutunc.blogspot.com.

These stories will be read anonymously at our event, Speak Out! Against Interpersonal Violence on Oct. 2 at 7 p.m. in the Pit.
