SEXUAL ASSAULT ON CAMPUS

Gambill will not attend hearing

Sophomore Landen Gambill filed a third complaint against UNC Monday.

> By Caitlin McCabe and Liz Crampton Senior Writers

With what should be just weeks to go until the Honor Court trial of sophomore Landen Gambill and her ex-boyfriend, Gambill's lawyer said Monday that she will no longer be participating.

In a Monday letter to Chancellor Holden Thorp, Henry Clay Turner, Gambill's attorney from the McSurely & Turner law firm, said the Honor Court case Gambill is facing is a "reckless prosecution" and demanded that the case be dropped.

"The retaliatory charges against my client are inappropriate, unconstitutional and utterly without merit," Turner wrote in the letter.

Turner also wrote in the letter that Gambill filed a new — and third — complaint with the U.S. Department of Education Monday based on the alleged retaliation.

The announcement that Gambill will not attend the trial comes on the heels of a nearly month-long effort from Gambill to have UNC drop a charge filed against her.

Gambill was charged Feb. 22 with a conduct violation of the University's Honor Code that claims she engaged in disruptive or intimidating behavior against the man she has publicly accused of raping her. Henry Ross, deputy student attorney general for the honor system, said if a student does not attend his or her trial, a plea of not guilty is entered on his or her behalf.

He said that even if a student is absent, his or her counsel-an undergraduate Honor Court member would be required to attend.

"You would never run a hearing without counsels for both sides," Ross said.

Though he could not speak to whether Gambill would face consequences for refusing to attend, he said it is always in a student's best interest to be present for a hearing.

"I can't think of a situation in which it would be advantageous or neutral for someone to refuse the option they have been given to speak on their own behalf," Ross said.

Neither Gambill nor Turner could be reached for comment Monday.

Frank LoMonte, executive director of the Student Press Law Center, said that in student judiciary proceedings, the student facing charges is usually not

A glut of restaurants could be hurting businesses on Franklin Street.

An slice of artichoke pizza from Artisan Pizza Kitchen. An A.K. ski from BSki's. A burger from Spanky's. Wings from The Grille at Four Corners.

When UNC students go to Franklin Street in search of food, the options can seem unlimited.

But a lack of diversity - highlighted by the fact that successful chain restaurants continue to move into downtown

Chapel Hill as others close - might be hurting local businesses.

According to a 2012 study commissioned by the Chapel Hill Downtown Partnership, an overabundance of restaurants has created a supply and demand gap in downtown.

Though the findings were not surprising to most, Chapel Hill business owners and officials are hoping that downtown businesses can be diversified to draw more customers to the area.

"I feel like the only things really standing the test of time are bars and restaurants right now," said Drew Hansel, the general manager of Spanky's Restaurant & Bar on Franklin Street.

"It's (downtown Chapel Hill businesses) not creating for any sort of diversity but just trying to cater for what students want.

The Downtown Partnership study estimates the annual demand for restaurants in downtown Chapel Hill at $16.9 million and the supply at $49 million. That amounts to a negative gap in demand for restaurants of about $32 million.

Bobby Funk, assistant director of the partnership, said the study showcases Chapel Hill's strengths in attracting certain types of businesses.

He said the partnership advocates for types of businesses that have the potential

'Rite' takes new color in show

Carolina Performing Arts' performance mixes film and composition about Holi.

By Josephine Yurcaba Assistant Arts Editor

Tonight Carolina Performing Arts celebrates a different rite of spring with a greater multitude of colors.

CPA's next commissioned performance in its "The Rite of Spring at 100" centennial celebration is a collaboration between composer Vijay Iyer and filmmaker Prashant Bhargava, titled "RADHE RADHE: Rites of Holi."

The show, which takes place tonight, features Bhargava's film, accompanied by a live orchestral composition written by Iyer and performed by the International Contemporary Ensemble.

The performance of Iyer's composition will be its world premiere.

Joe Florence, marketing and communications manager for CPA, said it wanted to commission Iyer because of his insight into "The Rite of Spring" in relation to the Indian celebration of Holi, without using the show's score.

"We're celebrating the rite of spring, but 'The Rite of Spring,' the actual music, is only played on stage twice (this season)," Florence said. "One thing that was very important to us was not recreating 'The Rite of Spring' 40 times."

Florence said CPA is not only honoring Stravinsky's work but is bringing a global context to the coming of spring with this collaboration.

The discussion will address "Human Canvas: The Holi Festival as a 'Rite of Spring."

Bhargava said he considered the foundation and goal of Stravinsky's piece to incite audiences — and applied that to the Hindu celebration of spring.

The Holi celebration, based on the legendary affair of Krishna and Radha, served as a destination for Bhargava's film, as he ventured to Mathura, India, in 2012 to film the celebration.

"There are a lot of rituals that are very primal and very sexual, have a lot of exuberance and are sometimes violent," Bhargava said. "I shot 30 hours of footage ... and started to construct a narrative based on the rituals and the foundation that were in the footage."

Bhargava said he cut all of his footage to a London Symphony Orchestra performance of "The Rite of Spring" and ended up with a 35-minute film.

The title, "RADHE RADHE," is a phrase Bhargava said people in this region of India would say if they bumped into you, were coming from temple or were in a state of exuberance. "It felt like there was a citywide infectious energy," Bhargava said.

Iyer said his work is less about Stravinsky and more about the connection among all rites of spring.

"I turned the sound off on Prashant's film and tried to create something else that was less about this episodic structure and was more of responding to what I was seeing," Iyer said.

DOT removes pink stripe from licenses

The stripe would have appeared on licenses for immigrants.

By Kelly Anderson Staff Writer

The N.C. Department of Transportation has amended a decision to issue driver's licenses with a controversial design but advocates say the changes are not extensive enough.

The original proposed license design, which included a pink stripe to distinguish citizens from noncitizens, raised concerns among immigrant advocacy groups.

The N.C. Attorney General's office had released a statement in January requiring DMV offices to issue the licenses starting Monday.

But the Department of Transportation announced just a few days before, on Thursday, that the licenses would not be issued with the stripe.

However, the licenses will still be marked with "NO LAWFUL STATUS" and "LIMITED TERM."

North Carolina joins 33 other states in issuing the licenses, which are permissible per the federal Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals policy.

The policy, enacted by President Barack Obama last year, offers temporary work or school permits to immigrants brought illegally to the country

Parking fee decision delayed

The Town Council could decide on a $250 parkand-ride fee in April.

By Kathryn Trogdon Staff Writer

Chapel Hill commuters will have to wait at least two more weeks to find out if they will be required to pay for access to local park-and-ride lots.

At a meeting Monday night, the Chapel Hill Town Council delayed a decision on a proposed $250 annual fee so the town can approach Triangle Transit about contributing financially on behalf of its riders.

The lots — which are located at Eubanks Road, Jones Ferry Road, Southern Village and Carrboro Plaza — are used by many residents who drive to the lots and then commute to locations throughout the Triangle via public transit.

The proposed fee would bring in about $81,000 for Chapel Hill, and the University would pay an estimated $150,000 for its students and employees that use the Chapel Hill lots.

Council members decided Monday to revisit the discussion on April 10 after asking Triangle Transit to pay for parkand-ride lot users who commute by Triangle Transit rather than Chapel Hill Transit.

Mayor Pro Tem Ed Harrison said he was concerned that the fee would lead to a decrease in users.

"Triangle Transit staff are certain if the kind of fees we are talking about are put on that lot it will affect their ridership," he said.

Triangle Transit estimates only a small proportion of Chapel Hill park-and-ride lot users commute on Triangle Transit.

Mayor Mark Kleinschmidt said he thought these commuters should be an exception.

"If people could prove citizenship of Chapel Hill and that they are not affiliated with the University, we could give them a discount. I think it would be great if we could waive it," he said. "I don't think it would hurt us too much."

Chapel Hill resident Nuno Gomes said he is one of the parkand-ride users who commutes to Raleigh on Triangle Transit.

'One of the main reasons I use the bus is to save money," he said. "I would love to see an exemption for people who don't use the town services."

Council member Jim Ward said it makes more sense to have Triangle Transit pay for its riders than waive the fee.

Ward also represents the Town Council on the town public transit committee, which endorsed the fee on March 19. He said because UNC decided to begin charging a fee for its park-and-ride lots, Chapel Hill has to do the same.

The University will charge a minimum annual fee of $227 for the use of its nine park-and-ride lots beginning in August.

Brian Litchfield, Chapel Hill Transit's interim director, said if UNC begins charging for parkand-ride lots and Chapel Hill does not, people will fill up the free lots to avoid paying a fee.

"We already have capacity issues at some of our park-andrides. We wouldn't necessarily be able to handle additional folks coming," he said.

Tar Heels to face Delaware phenom

The women's basketball team will play Delaware at 7 p.m.

By Henry Gargan Assistant Sports Editor

NEWARK, Del. — On Sunday, the Bob Carpenter Center, where sixth-seeded Delaware matched up against 11-seed West Virginia, was deafeningly loud.

When No. 3 seed North Carolina takes on Delaware in the second round of the NCAA women's basketball tournament to night, the fans in that arena — Delaware's  $\,$ home court — promise nothing short of pandemonium.

The fervor surrounding the Blue Hens during the past four years has centered on Delaware's dynamic hybrid forward/guard Elena Delle Donne. The crowd will know her game tonight against the Tar Heels could be her last.

A former Connecticut recruit and the top player in the nation out of high school, Delle Donne transferred home to Delaware during her freshman year, where she has gone on to lead the Blue Hens into the national spotlight. This season, she is averaging 25.5 points per game, and dropped 33 points on the Mountaineers in the first

"Everybody's been asking us what we're going to do to stop her or whatever," UNC coach Sylvia Hatchell said, shaking her head. "I think maybe we'll just leave her open, since everybody else has tried to guard her. That's the only strategy no one's used on her yet."

UNC's 6-foot-6 Waltiea Rolle is tall enough to keep up with the 6-foot-5 Delle Donne in the post, but the All-American's athleticism and savvy for the game make her a threat anywhere on the court.

She shoots at a 92 percent clip from the foul line, hits 47.6 percent from beyond the arc, pulls down more than eight rebounds per game, and has blocked 67 shots this season.

Hatchell mentioned that her team, as it has all season, would simply try to use a variety of defensive schemes during the course of the game to keep Delle Donne from finding a groove.

But the rest of the Delaware team is similarly solid — the Blue Hens turned the ball over just nine times on Sunday against West Virginia. North Carolina gave the ball up 20 times against Albany.

That number, though, is primarily a product of the speed with which the Tar Heels play. Tierra Ruffin-Pratt's 30-point performance in UNC's 59-54 victory against Albany showed Delaware coach Tina Martin how important tempo will be against the Tar Heels.

She has a lot of swagger about her when she steps on the floor," Martin said. "You're not going to stop a great player like that. You're not going to stop her. The only thing you can do is try to contain her and try to play team defense. We've got to be able to slow them down.

Dick Wood helps fellow resident of Carol Woods Retirement Community, Louise Williams, sort out her recyclable wastes into the correct bins.

Successful recycling program threatened by privatization

By Gayatri Surendranathan

They call him "Mr. Recycling." Lew Woodham, a resident of Carol Woods Retirement Community on Weaver Dairy Road, has been heading the community's recycling program for the past 10 years.

And considering the community's standing as the county's best recycler — an estimated 60 percent of its waste is recycled, composted or repurposed — Woodham has a lot to be proud of.

"It feels very good to be so successful," Woodham said. "It's kind of like being the best of the best, because the county is one of the best recyclers in the state."

But a recent proposal to privatize the county's recycling services could threaten Carol Woods' success.

The Carol Woods recycling program has a mutually beneficial relationship with the

The county provides information and support to Carol Woods while using the community's enthusiasm for recycling as an example for similar complexes, said Orange County

Solid Waste Management Director Gayle

Wilson said if the county moves forward with the proposal, the relationship with Carol Woods could unravel.

"As an entity, they are the most impassioned recyclers in the county," Wilson said. "If privatization went through a company would probably replace us, and who knows if they would build the same relationship we have with Carol Woods.'

The 120-acre community is home to more than 450 residents who recycle everything from food scraps to eyeglasses.

"Especially in a senior community, if you want a successful recycling program you have to make it easy," Woodham said, as he pointed to separate boxes in the mailroom for mixed paper, plastic bags, eyeglasses and batteries.

Chutes along the walls and clearly marked receptacles make recycling intuitive for all residents, Woodham said.

He said these ideas come from any members of the community who are passionate about recycling.

"It's a community with a lot of vested interest," Woodham said.

Dick Wood, a volunteer recycling leader at Carol Woods, said that though he has only been at Carol Woods for seven years, he has been recycling for at least 20 years.

"I think it's more than cool — it's a wonderful thing to do," Wood said. "There's so much material that gets wasted that can actually be

He said the most challenging part of the program is making sure people do it correctly. "You can't mix bottles with paper and stuff,"

The Orange County Board of Commissioners will hold a public hearing about privatizing recycling services on April

But for now, Carol Woods will continue to work with the county to keep up its position as the best recycler.

"It's something we take great pride in," Wood said. "There are so many people here who realize there are important things like recycling to do."

Sequestration may affect work-study

UNC could lose 31 work-study jobs beginning next year.

By Sam Schaefer Staff Writer

Under federal budget sequestration, UNC could lose approximately 31 work-study jobs beginning the next academic year unless it can find a way to make up the funds.

As part of the 2011 deal to raise the federal debt limit, Congress passed the Budget Control Act, which mandated spending cuts of $1.2 trillion, known as sequestration, which took effect March 1.

If sequestration stands, the University will lose $84,000 in federal work-study funding, said Shirley Ort, associate provost and director of scholarships and student aid. The average work-study student is awarded $2,700, Ort said.

"We need every dollar that we have in the Federal Work-Study Program," she said. She said if sequestration stands, her office will work to make up the difference lost. "What we would do is try to make up that loss in federal funds with additional University money, so it wouldn't result in fewer work opportunities for students," she said. Ort said the University would not lose money from the Federal Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant Program or from Federal Pell Grants, both of which are sheltered under sequestration.

ships and student aid, said the University has not yet figured out where it would get the replacement money if sequestration is not avoided. "Operating under federal regulations, we're used to not having control over a lot of the decisions that are made that directly affect us and our students, so that is nothing new for us," she said. "But, certainly, any time there are cuts made to any of the programs we have available for students, it's very frustrating.

"This change is particularly frustrating because it happened because of a lack of government working together."

Zach Kaplan, a member of the executive board for the Campus Y who also holds a work-study job, took part in a trip to the nation's capitol as part of the ACC Student Educational Advocacy Trip to advocate for federal funding for student aid and research in the face of sequestration earlier this month.

He said the timing of the trip was frustrating because sequestration had already taken effect, but he was glad representatives listened to their personal perspectives.

He said he is worried about UNC's ability to continue funding work-study jobs.

"It's a tricky situation because if the government isn't funding the University, then the University has to come up with it on their own, and the University is struggling with its own budgeting issues," he said.

"A lot of times, work-study just falls through the cracks."

ALL IN THE FAMILY

Council family leaves its mark on Chapel Hill

By Tyler Clay Staff Writer

Pink Floyd's The Dark Side of the Moon — which celebrated the 40th anniversary of its UK release on Sunday — has a seldom-mentioned connection to Chapel Hill.

One half of Pink Floyd's name is derived from a 1930s Chapel Hill blues guitarist named Floyd Council. The other half came from Pink Anderson, a blues musician out of South Carolina.

Decades after Council played his music on the streets of Chapel Hill, his relatives continue to leave their mark on the town.

Floyd Council is a relative of another well-known Chapel Hill figure — Mildred "Mama Dip" Council, the owner of Mama Dip's restaurant on Rosemary Street.

Mama Dip said she remembers Floyd Council, her husband's cousin and a good friend, as a happy and fun-loving man.

Floyd Council's nicknames in the music industry included "Dipper Boy" and "The Devil's Daddy-in-Law."

"In those days no one really taught guitar — you had to learn from someone in the family," Mama Dip said.

"He got started playing in the street for money."

He only recorded a few songs, but he played music until he suffered a stroke in 1970. He died six years later.

Family members continue to distinguish themselves as an important part of the town's culinary history.

Mama Dip said she moved to Chapel Hill in 1945 at the age of 16, and she opened her restaurant in 1976.

"It's a landmark I hope lasts as long as the Old Well," said Mama Dip's granddaughter Tonya Council said of Mama Dip's restaurant.
Tonya Council is just one of Mama Dip's descendants to carry on her tradition of cooking, opening Tonya's Cookie Company in 2009.

Tonya Council said she began by experimenting in her grandmother's kitchen while bussing tables at the restaurant.

She said her best-known cookies are pecan crisp. She said her goal was to create a cookie that tasted just like her grandmother's pecan pie.

"Nobody cooks as good as Mama Dip," Tonya Council said. "We're all runners-up."

Mama Dip's daughter Annette "Neecy" Council also opened a cake batter mix company, Sweet Neecy, in 2009.

Annette Council said she began her company by making homemade cakes for extra money. She later realized it would be more efficient to make cake mix and leave the baking to the customer.

She said the company is her way of carrying on the family's legacy in Chapel Hill.

"Everyone should live their own dreams," she said. "This is my portion of continuing the legacy."

Q&A with Indian Elder in Residence

Senora Lynch, member of the Haliwa-Saponi tribe and newly selected 2013 Elder in Residence for the UNC American Indian Center will discuss "The Gift" — her mosaic design on a walkway outside the Student Union tonight.

Staff writer Sarah Ang spoke with Lynch about being selected for the residency, her past projects and what inspires her pottery.

Daily Tar Heel: How does it feel being chosen as the 2013 Elder in Residence, and what do you plan to accomplish?

Senora Lynch: I'm very honored to be asked to come as an elder — though I don't think of myself as one. Sometimes when you hear elder it's compared to age, but it's also compared to who you respect.

I have a lot to learn in life. I have a long way to go before I reach the elder status, because life teaches you a lot.

But I'll share what's been given to me and I'll try to represent all the tribes in North Carolina as I come to UNC.

I want to enlighten people and let them know there are many Indian people who live in North Carolina.

Hopefully, they'll get a better understanding of the tribe, the community we come from and learn more about our culture.

DTH: Many people walk through "The Gift" without realizing what it is. Can you elaborate about the project?

SL: They were going to designate the Student Union as a place for student diversity, and they wanted to make sure it represented all cultures.

I was, of course, very nervous. I'd never done anything like that, of that direction or that scale.

I went back to the drawing board, trying to relate things that were part of Indian culture as a whole, but also things that can relate to other people as they live their life.

I have dogwood flowers for the springtime and new beginnings. It's perfect for college kids because you step onto the University and you have a new beginning — you have a fresh start in life.

DTH: Can you tell me more about your artwork, in terms of being part of the Haliwa-Saponi tribe?

SL: I consider my work a contemporary and traditional style of pottery.

It has a lot of traditional elements: the hand-coiling, the red clay, and that it's hand-built. It's contemporary because you wouldn't have found old Native American pottery as elaborate as mine. But you would find important symbols like turtles, birds, eagles and bears.

DTH: Do you think your art helps your tribe in a way?

SL: I do. It's like an oral history being passed down through the pottery. It also helps us to hold on to something — to what we do have. And we do have the earth, we have our elders, we have our stories

DTH: Have you always been interested in art?

$1: All my life, I've done some kind of art with my hands. I've always created and looked at things as beautiful. Everything, in my opinion, is art.

Learning Center to test graduate coaching program

By Janell Smith Staff Writer

After more than a decade of having only two certified learning coaches, the Learning Center finally has the funding to add a graduate student coach as part of a new pilot program.

Theresa Maitland and Kristen Rademacher have been coaching at UNC for more than 10 years, and said they are looking forward to expanding.

The Learning Center was one of 14 organizations that recently received grants from the Carolina Parents Council, and it was awarded the second largest grant amount of $10,000.

Maitland said the center hopes to impact more undergraduate students while working within budgetary restraints. The graduate coaches will gain experience in education while costing the center less than a professional coach, she said.

Stephanie Miller, 2013-14 national co-chairwoman of the Parents Council, said the council was impressed with Center Parish the Learning Center's proposal to increase academic support for undergraduates through coaching because it coincided with the council's objectives, she said.

Jewman

"Coaching gives students the opportunity to set goals and develop action plans while meeting one-on-one with learning coaches and in group meetings," Miller said.

The Learning Center did not receive the full $15,000 grant it originally requested.

"Our dream was originally to have three graduate coaches," Maitland said. "This will not happen, but we will certainly look to how the Writing Center has expanded with graduate students as a model. We would start with a small core, train that small core, and then expand."

Bill Miller, 2013-14 national co-chairman of the council, said it cannot fully fund every grant and had asked applicants to list the money necessary to create an effective program. The Learning Center listed this amount at $10,000, the amount of money it would cost to hire one graduate student.

APPLY TO BE A COACH

Due date: April 10 Interviews will likely be held between April 15 and 19. Info: bit.ly/15NLQ54

The pilot program will provide important information to full-time staff about the effectiveness of graduate students as coaches and employees of the Learning Center, Maitland said.

This information will be crucial if the Learning Center plans to expand the graduate student staff and seek further funding from the University and potential donors, she

"We know there is an interest (in the coaching programs)," Maitland said. "We simply do not have the capacity to reach the numbers of undergraduates who need our help.

"We hope to help students balance their social and academic experience here at Carolina."

Bright future for town of Hillsborough

Mayor Tom Stevens spoke on a recent growth in business.

By Caroline Hudson Staff Writer

Among a crowd of about 40 people gathered in the Hillsborough Town Barn on Monday night, Mayor Tom Stevens looked to the town's bright future.

In his annual State of the Town Address, Stevens spoke highly of Hillsborough, saying the area fosters a sense of community and gives visitors the opportunity to experience an authentic Southern town. "It really is our best asset," he said.

Another one of the town's assets — Churton Street, the main street in Hillsborough - had been awarded the title of "Great Main Street" by the North Carolina Chapter of the American Planning

Stevens said the street will add new restaurants, a new preschool and day care, and newly expanded businesses in the coming year.

Association in 2012.

Despite the town's recent growth in business, Hillsborough's population has grown by fewer than 700 people from 2000-10 - its lowest population growth in the past three decades.

While the town hasn't grown significantly in population, Stevens said it has grown in vibrancy.

He said the town has increased its emphasis on tourism, drawing visitors to its downtown historic district.

Stevens also recognized the quality of the town's infrastructure, including the expansion of the Hillsborough Wastewater Treatment Plant — which he said is on time and under budget.

The new facility is expected to make Hillsborough's water some of the best-treated in the nation.

'We can flush with confidence," Stevens said, drawing laughs from the crowd in the packed town barn.

The Riverwalk is a 1.3-mile greenway that would run beside the Eno River through downtown Hillsborough to the Historic Occoneechee Speedway Trail.

Wagner said the trail will offer variety for people who want to get exercise without having to deal with traffic.

Hillsborough Town Manager Eric Peterson also spoke optimistically about the future of Hillsborough. He said the town's budget looks more promising this year than in previous years.

"I'm actually excited that I don't have any bad news this year," he said.

Peterson said it is important for residents to be able to see the fruits of their tax money.

Stevens said town officials are looking to invest strategically and minimize the impact of taxes on citizens.

We also believe very much in investing in our people," he said.

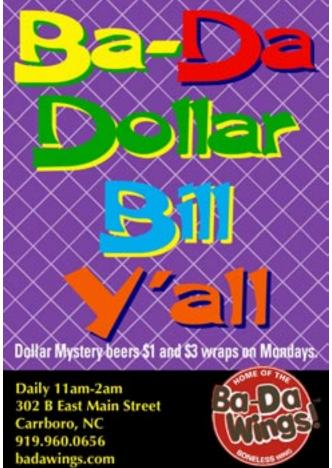

Stevens said he hopes residents will find community, heritage and prosperity in to thrive on Franklin Street. "It's largely the notion that we do food really well," Funk said.

In addition to restaurants, downtown retail types with a higher supply than demand included office supply stores, florists and book and music

The study identified several business types downtown lacks, including general merchandise and grocery stores. Other specialty stores such as sporting goods, shoes and jewelry stores were found to be in low supply.

Kyle Vangel, a senior analyst at HR&A Advisors and former UNC graduate student, helped conduct the study.

He said diversifying downtown business would draw more customers into the area.

Vangel said this would aid existing businesses by keeping potential customers from leaving downtown in search of more retail options.

Glen Gordon, owner of Tomato Jake's Pizzeria at Southpoint and former owner of the recently closed Franklin Street location, said diversifying the downtown business market would foster a larger consumer base.

"If you want to attract more, different people, you have to attract different businesses," he said.

Dwight Bassett, economic development officer for Chapel Hill, said businesses downtown do need to be more diverse.

But Bassett did not link the lack of diversity with the recent closures of a few iconic Franklin Street restaurants.

Longtime Franklin Street restaurant Pepper's Pizza closed its doors on March 4, citing declining business. Jack Sprat Cafe also unexpectedly closed in October after eight years on Franklin Street.

Competition from UNC

While a lack of retail diversity might be hurting downtown, many Franklin Street businesses attribute recent woes to their biggest competitor for student customers - UNC.

Gordon said he had to sell his Franklin Street location due to a lack of revenue. He also said an increase in the quality of on-campus food services in the past few years has played a large role in the restaurant closures on Franklin Street.

"We had to sell her because we were losing money," he said.

Hansel said competition to bring in student customers is increasingly difficult.

"Yes, it is hard to compete with other restaurants — especially ones that are geared towards a student population because on Franklin Street, you need to cater towards students," he said.

Emily Hansel, a former worker at Squid's Restaurant, and the wife of Spanky's General Manager Drew Hansel, said the addition of chain restaurants to on-campus dining has kept students on campus for meals.

"Kids are like, 'Oh, I eat at that restaurant at home and here is a little version of it that I can eat of it at school;" she said.

Scott Myers, director of food and vending for UNC, said he does not believe campus dining is negatively affecting Franklin Street restaurants. He said most students live off campus and on-campus residents are not required to have a meal plan.

Everyone just wants to serve their customers the best they can," he said.

RITES OF HOLI

Iyer said he has never worked with an ensemble like this, or made art from a film.

"It's been a hard time finding a unity and finding a way to harness the energy," Iyer said.

Florence said this performance is not only about globalizing "The Rite of Spring" but also about giving context to UNC celebrations of Holi by working with Holi Moli UNC.

Sarah Barger, an executive board member for Holi Moli UNC, said the group's mission this year is to help students recognize the cultural significance of the event and to have fun.

"We want to shift the perspective from an event that is just people throwing powder at each other to a cultural experience with importance in history and religion," she said. "The context is crucial."

However, Bhargava and Iyer said inciting emotion outweighs context.

"The concept of 'The Rite of Spring' was to create this attraction and repulsion and stir up people," Bhargava said.

"I hope people will come and feel a little bit of winter as they're walking in and leave feeling a little bit of spring."

before the age of 16.

To receive a license, recipients in the program must provide the same documents as citizens — proof of age and identity, residency, Social Security and liability insurance as well as proof of legal presence by the U.S. government.

Program participants must also take a road and written exam and provide proof of auto insurance.

Secretary of Transportation Tony Tata said in the press release that the license changes will make the roads as safe as possible.

Still, some immigration groups say more needs to be done.

Jose Torres-Don, who works with the N.C. DREAM Team's coordinating committee, said that though the DMV's removal of the pink stripe on the license was a step in the right direction, the alteration does not address the larger problem of discrimination toward immigrants.

"We welcome the license as an option that we did not have before," Torres-Don said.

"At the end of the day, we are still subject to deportation and harassment."

Ron Woodard, director of N.C. Listen, an immigration reform group, said the license changes will not help curb illegal immigration.

"I certainly understand the dilemma young people are in because of their parents, but what we should be considering are the consequences of immigration changes."

required to appear in court and testify.

While LoMonte said he cannot speak for the UNC case, he cited a sexual assault case at Oklahoma State University in which a male student was charged with violating university sexual misconduct policy. The student did not attend his student judiciary hearing.

"In a proceeding like that, if the student targeted by the accuser chose not to put up a defense then the panel has to go with the evidence before it," LoMonte said.

"That doesn't mean that the person who doesn't show up loses; it's still the burden of the person bringing the complaint to show that it's well-founded. Even in the absence of defense, if the accuser doesn't meet their legal burden the case could still be dismissed," he said.

"We have always had turnover, we will always have

The letter also harshly criticizes UNC administrators, claiming that the charge brought against Gambill is retaliation for speaking out about how UNC handled her sexual assault trial heard in the spring of 2012.

Though the University has repeatedly stated that it has no hand in charging students with Honor Code violations, Turner's letter said that "is simply not the case." "You, Chancellor Thorp, responsibility to immediately dismiss this charge," Turner said in the letter. The letter cites the responsibilities of the chancellor defined by UNC's Instrument of Student Judicial

have the authority and the Governance, which says that the chancellor remains solely responsible for all matters of student discipline.

But the Instrument later states the chancellor has in the past granted the responsibility of student conduct policy to other parties.

"The chancellor has typically and traditionally conferred student discipline to the student-led honor system," said Undergraduate Student Attorney General Amanda Claire Grayson in a previous interview.

Gambill has said in previous interviews that charging her with an Honor Code violation is backlash for speaking out about UNC's treatment of sexual assault victims and for filing complaints with two offices in the U.S. Department of Education — the Office for Civil Rights and the Clery Act

"The retaliatory charges against my client are ... utterly without merit."

Henry Clay Turner, attorney for Landen Gambill

Compliance Division. Both complaints were opened for investigation this month — after Gambill was charged.

"This charge is a flagrant example of how UNC is willing to treat survivors in order to protect perpetrators,' Gambill said in February.

Thorp said in a March 2 statement that administrators have no authority over Honor Court charge decisions.

'The accusation that the University has retaliated against a student for filing a complaint is totally and completely false," Thorp said. University spokeswoman at Tin Fulton Walker & Owen who represents Gambill's ex-boyfriend — the man she has repeatedly accused of rape — said UNC played no role in the complaint filed by Gambill's ex-boyfriend. "(Administrators) didn't seek him out to file a complaint," Gresham said. "They had no contact with him. I advised him to file the complaint." "It would be my guess that the University would have hoped my client would not file this charge, based on all the attention since," he said.

LoMonte said the composition of university honor courts determines to what extent administrators have an influence over proceedings, adding that judiciaries entirely made up of students are likely to operate independently.

"If the university knowingly presses forward with what they are certain is a frivolous case, then they can be at fault," he said. "But if it truly is something that is insulated from administrators' involvement, at least at the investigation, it's hard to attribute their behavior to the administrators and to the institution."

"If a student organization commits a wrongful act you can hold that organization responsible, but you can't typically attribute their behavior to a college as a whole."

To comply with the change, students and faculty must remove the current product from their laptops before August 1.

Stan Waddell, executive director and information security officer for Information

He said UNC will save money by making this change because licensing for the new product is already covered by the campus agreement with Microsoft.

sent to the community March 18 on how to comply, students and faculty can choose to use whichever antivirus product they want for their personal computers.

Ramon Padilla, associate vice chancellor and deputy chief information officer for ITS, said the University is changing antivirus vendors because administrators were unhappy with some of the functions of the software.

"Much of the feedback that we have received has been from the departmental administrators that have to administer the software from their departments, and Symantec is not always the easiest product to use," he said.

"All products have issues, but it had some issues that were problematic for some people."

Tim McGuire, director of campus infrastructure services, said that because the University will no longer be paying the licensing fee, students and faculty will be responsible for paying that fee if Symantec becomes aware that they are still using the product after August 1.

He also said the Symantec product will become less effective, as students would be running an antivirus software that is unable to get updates.

Padilla said another benefit of the software is that students and faculty will have access to the Microsoft product even after they have left the University.

"For the campus as a whole, we end up with a tool that we find, in our research anyway so far, a stronger piece of software in terms of being able to catch viruses and is easier to manage for us as an institution."

Mossad prisoner may have revealed informant IDs

JERUSALEM (MCT) -An Israeli secret agent whose death in Israel's highest security prison was kept secret for nearly two years may have inadvertently revealed details of one of Israel's most important intelligence-gathering networks, according to new accounts of the case published Monday.

Why Mossad agent Ben Zygier, who was known until earlier this year only as Prisoner X, was jailed had been a lingering mystery of the case. Zygier spent nearly a year in solitary confinement so intense that not even his jailers knew his real name before he died, allegedly a suicide. Israeli officials added to the mystery by banning journalists from reporting on the case after Zygier was found dead in his cell in December 2010.

A wide variety of theories for his imprisonment had been floated, including that he'd sold intelligence to Iran, was preparing to publish a tell-all about the Mossad or had turned double agent for a government in the Persian

But the new reports suggest that Zygier was a deskbound agent who botched a self-initiated effort to turn a Hezbollah operative into an Israeli agent, instead ending up revealing the identities of Israeli operatives in Lebanon.

According to Fairfax Media, Australia's largest newspaper publisher, and Germany's Der Spiegel magazine, which conducted a joint investigation into the case, Zygier unwittingly handed over Israeli intelligence files to a man he thought he was turning into a double agent for Israel.

Zygier, the news organizations claimed, thought that by turning the man into a double agent he'd win the approval of his bosses at the Mossad and be promoted within the spy agency. Instead, Zygier gave away information that included the identities of two of the Mossad's best informants in

"Zygier wanted to achieve something that he didn't end up getting," the Fairfax report quoted an unidentified, highly placed Israeli official as saying. "He crossed paths with someone who was much more professional than he was."

Supreme Court to hear affirmative action case

WASHINGTON, D.C. (MCT) — The Supreme Court will hear Michigan's appeal of a surprising ruling that struck down its voters' ban on giving "preferential treatment" to students based on their race, weighing the emotionally tense issue of affirmative action for the second time in

The Michigan measure is nearly identical to the California proposition that in 1996 abolished race-based affirmative action policies for admission to the state's colleges and universities.

But defenders of affirmative action went to federal court in Michigan and won a ruling from the U.S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals that held the state measure unconstitutional on the grounds it took away a civil rights provision that benefited minorities.

The Supreme Court justices are highly skeptical of any use of race-based policies. and few doubted the justices would hear Michigan's defense of its ban on racebased affirmative action. The only surprise was that the justices announced Monday they would hear the appeal before they ruled on a pending affirmative action case involving the University of Texas.

In the Texas case, lawyers for a rejected white student urged the court to rule that giving preferences to applicants based on their race violates the Constitution's promise of "equal protection of the laws." A decision in that case, Fisher vs. University of Texas, is expected this spring.

Michigan's voters appeared to adopt the kind of race-neutral admission policies that many of the justices favor. It told the state universities to admit students without regard to their race or ethnicity.

U.S. hands Bagram prison to Afghan government

BAGRAM, Afghanistan (MCT) — The U.S. handed over control of the prison at Bagram Air Field to the Afghan government Monday, resolving a major sticking point that had been complicating relations between Washington and Kabul as both countries brace for the departure of most U.S. troops by the end of 2014.

Assuming control of the detention facility at the U.S.run air base had been a key demand of Afghan President Hamid Karzai, who in recent weeks has stepped up his anti-American rhetoric and ratcheted up tension between Kabul and Washington. Earlier this month while Defense Secretary Chuck Hagel was visiting Kabul, Karzai accused the U.S. of colluding with the Afghan Taliban so that both the U.S. and the insurgents could maintain a presence in Afghanistan, a remark that infuriated officials in Washington.

At a ceremony at the air base, located in Parwan province just north of Kabul, U.S. and Afghan officials pointed to the transfer of the detention facility to Afghan control as a vital step in the gradual handover of security responsibility from the U.S. to the Afghan government.

"Today represents the increase in sovereignty of the Afghan people," said Marine Gen. Joseph F. Dunford Jr., the top American commander in Afghanistan. "It's significant because it is part of the broader political and security transition process."

The prison at Bagram was the largest U.S.-run detention facility in Afghanistan. It was built in 2009, though U.S. troops have held detainees at Bagram Air Field as far back as 2002 at a makeshift lockup. It was also the site of one of the lowest points in relations between Afghanistan and the U.S. — the burning of copies of the Koran by U.S. troops last year, which triggered several days of deadly

A year ago, Afghan and U.S. officials had agreed in principle to the Bagram detention facility handover, but both sides were unable to resolve concerns in Washington that the Afghan government would release suspected members of the Taliban or other insurgent groups.

U.N. officials had also expressed concern that ceding control of the detention facility to the Afghan government could subject detainees to abuse. U.S. and Afghan officials appeared ready to announce the transfer two weeks ago, but the ceremony

Cypriot banks to remain closed after bailout deal

NICOSIA, Cyprus (MCT) In a sudden turn of events, all Cypriot banks on Monday were ordered to remain closed until Thursday, just hours before banks on the eastern Mediterranean island were to be reopened to the public for the first time in 10 days.

The decision, which was announced by the central bank, came from Finance Minister Michael Sarris, who ordered all banks in the country to remain shut "for the smooth functioning of the entire banking system."

The announcement came hours after the bank had said that all banks, with the exception of the country's two largest lenders, the Bank of Cyprus and Laiki, would open on Tuesday morning. Banks across the country have been shut since March 16 as government officials and international lenders wrestled over a bailout plan to raise badly needed funds totaling 5.8 billion euros ($7.5 billion) so that the country could qualify for a 10 billion euro ($12.9 billion) bailout package.

Hours earlier in a nationally televised speech, President Nicos Anastasiades said the central bank would impose some restrictions on bank transactions when they reopen to the public.

He did not say what limitations would be imposed on transactions, but that it was a "very temporary measure which will gradually be relaxed."

"The central bank will apply restrictions, but this will only be temporary until the situation normalizes and returns to calm," he said.

A deal securing the bailout was reached early Monday.

The new plan foresees losses absorbed by Cyprus' two largest banks, one of which is to be immediately wound down, with the holders of deposits of more than 100,000 euros ($129,900) taxed at a still to be determined amount.

Wrecking ball for the economy

n an era of intense political polarization, most of us can agree that creating jobs and reviving the economy should be a top policy priority, given that North Carolina has the third-highest unemployment rate in the country.

The GOP leaders running state government seem to have missed the memo.

Instead of seeking meaningful solutions, N.C. Republicans have spent the first few months of 2013 pursuing an unpopular and divisive policy agenda that's more like an economic wrecking ball than a formula for success.

Expanding Medicaid with Obamacare, for instance, would save the state an estimated $65 million in expenses during the next eight years and create 23,000 new jobs while extending health coverage to 650,000 low-income North Carolinians. But Gov. Pat McCrory and the N.C. General Assembly decided to reject the Medicaid expansion.

And Rep. Mike Hager, R-Burke and the House of Representatives' majority whip, is championing a bill to freeze the state standard mandating 12.5 percent renewable energy by 2021.

Hager must not know the renewable energy mandate is an economic boon for the state. It has helped create 21,000 job-years — individuals fully employed for one year — and $1.7 billion in economic benefits since 2007, and it is projected to save ratepayers $173 million by 2026. According to a recent report, North Carolina ranked second nationally in 2012 for clean energy jobs.

Despite the state's improved fiscal situation, McCrory's budget proposal, released Wednesday, would continue state disinvestment in higher education and economic development opportunities that are critical for the future. It would cut $55 million from the UNC system, signaling quite clearly that there's no appetite for restoring the university system to its pre-recession funding

The proposed budget would also hurt rural communities by zeroing out $65 million in annual funding for the Golden LEAF program and cutting $10 million from the N.C. Rural Economic Development Center.

The GOP is also perpetuating trickle-down economic theories about lowering tax rates that have been repeatedly refuted. McCrory recently signed a bill eliminating the earned income tax credit, which benefits lowincome residents, while his budget outline offers a handout to the wealthy by ending the estate tax. Apparently it's only politically acceptable to raise taxes when it hurts poor people.

Republicans have spent a lot of time touting their efforts to bring fracking to North Carolina. It's a good campaign talking point, but the state's oil and gas study estimates the fracking industry would only support a paltry 387 jobs.

On issue after issue, GOP leaders are letting ideology drive the policy agenda rather than being bothered with facts or evidence. The milliondollar question is whether Republicans running amok will prompt voter backlash - and whether Democrats will be ready to respond with a positive economic vision for the state.

Pat-ently wrong

McCrory's proposed budget neglects higher education.

ast week, the Office of State Budget and Management released Gov. Pat McCrory's first budget proposal. The proposal contained drastic cuts to the UNC system.

This proposed budget would damage higher education in the state and force the system to sacrifice the quality of education. It hits UNC-Chapel Hill harder than many of the state's other schools.

The budget's less-thanenthusiastic tone on public higher education was set early in McCrory's term, when he derided liberal arts education during a radio interview while discussing his vision for educational reform.

McCrory has stressed his intentions to "make North Carolina an engine for job creation," but if he wishes to succeed in that endeavor, this budget proposal certainly is not the right approach to take.

The $55 million cut would be accompanied by increasing out-of-state tuition by 12.3 percent for six universities — including UNC-Chapel Hill— and an increase of 6 percent for out-of-state students at the remaining schools.

This tuition hike would cause a reduction in the geographic diversity of students on campus. Moreover, increased tuition would discourage many talented out-of-state students from attending the University.

Also, non-resident students receiving full scholarships would be considered out-of-state students when assessing tuition. This would cause scholarship foundations to award fewer scholarships to out-of-state students. Diversity and talent would suffer.

According to the budget, raising tuition for full scholarship students across the system would raise $8.6 million for the state next year. But it comes as the very real cost of scaring off top talent and shrinking a future alumni donor pool.

The proposed budget would also force the consolidation of "small" and "duplicative" degree programs.

This would cause programs that have been designed for specific occupations to be generalized, resulting in new graduates being less competitive in their potential career fields.

Also, this proposal could include the elimination of programs that are found at multiple schools, prohibiting those not enrolled in the chosen school from majoring in their desired field.

Additionally, N.C. School of Science and Math graduates would see a reinstatement of the waivers that granted them free tuition at UNCsystem schools.

These waivers were stopped two years ago to help ease the budget deficit. Reinstating this program seems odd in a budget full of cuts.

It is unreasonable to expect that each student graduating from the school is qualified for a full tuition waiver. Universities across the system have a wide variety of merit and academic scholarships that the school's graduates can apply for.

The program, which cost the state $3.1 million in 2008-09, is inequitable for graduating high school students. The high school's graduates should have the same access to recognition and support, just like the other public high school students in the state. Though their attendance should be taken into account, it alone doesn't merit a tuition waiver.

Furthermore, the UNC-system Board of Governors set a goal to increase the percentage of N.C. residents holding a bachelor's degree to at least 32 percent — currently at 26 percent — by 2018. The increased tuition and larger class sizes that would result from this budget do not seem like the appropriate strategy to reach that goal. By making degrees less affordable, those in the state who struggle to pay tuition will have an even harder time.

Even if this six percent increase is somehow met, the value of each graduate's degree will significantly deteriorate. The decrease in the quality of the education received by each graduate will certainly be harmful to the integrity of the system.

Employers will no longer view a UNC graduate with the same respect if the system is turned into a degree factory.

The UNC system has long been a bastion of higher education. While the economic woes of recent years have forced the system to make significant cuts, it is time the cuts stop.

TO THE EDITOR:

On behalf of my teammates and coaches I am writing to you disappointed and angry at your lack of coverage for the UNC women's swim team.

We just returned from the NČAA Women's Swimming and Diving Championships, a three-day competition in Indianapolis.

It is the fastest meet in college swimming, and we finished 12th, the highest in 12 years with 12 girls. We made waves, if you will, in the college swimming world by having more than 50 percent personal best times and finaling in almost every individual event in which we qualified.

How could you not at least put a small article acknowledging our strong performances?

Attend 7 p.m. lecture on neurotechnology

TO THE EDITOR: Today at 7 p.m., the UNC Global Studies Great Decisions program will host Alenka Brown-Vanhoozer for a onehour lecture on "Threat Assessment."

The lecture will take place in Caldwell 111 and is open to anyone in the community eager to learn more about the topic.

Brown-Vanhoozer is the director of the Information Operations Center at Oak and has extensive experience working with the Department of Defense and various other government agencies.

She was most recently a senior research fellow at the Center for Technology and National Security Policy at the National Defense University in Washington, D.C.

Today, Brown-Vanhoozer will discuss "Neuro-Psychometrics Analysis" don't know what this is? Most people don't because it is a trade secret, and publicly available information on the methodology is limited, if not entirely nonexistent.

Those who want to learn more will have to attend the lecture, but the topic falls under the realm of emerging developments in neurotechnology.

Neurotechnology involves tools and techniques for examining behavior patterns to better understand human attitudes and intentions, and it can be used for a variety of purposes from marketing to military and national security.

Given the cuttingedge nature of Brown-Vanhoozer's topic, it promises to be an interesting lecture that will offer a peek into the emerging technologies that will influence our society.

So come out to Caldwell

111 today at 7 p.m. and learn something new and exciting.

Help improve state's farmworker conditions

TO THE EDITOR:

In honor of National Farmworker Awareness Week (NFAW), I feel compelled to respond to the N.C. Farm Bureau's press release detailing the results of their statewide survey of the N.C. agriculture industry.

The speakers emphasize the importance of a workable "guest-worker" program for North Carolina's farmers.

Stressing the fact that agriculture is the largest industry in our state, one speaker states that "our farmers deserve a voice in Raleigh and in Washington."

Farmworkers, too, deserve a voice in immigration reform that will impact their lives. Any planned "guest-worker" program must be designed to uphold the human rights of the men and women who work in North Carolina's fields.

The N.C. Farm Bureau's survey does recognize the inadequacy of our current "guest-worker" program.

Undocumented farmworkers do not have the basic legal protections or labor rights afforded to other workers.

As a result, they face low wages, harsh working conditions, lack of adequate housing and constant vulnerability to employer abuses.

Corporations like R.J. Reynolds make huge profits from the tobacco industry, yet farmworkers regularly suffer from human rights abuses, such as "green tobacco sickness," from the lack of necessary protective gear and training.

Please come out to support Alianza at our events this week and find out how to help improve farmworker conditions in North Carolina.

Engage in discussions about animal testing

TO THE EDITOR:

In response to the recent DTH column and letter to the editor concerning animal testing, the Carolina Undergraduate Bioethics Scholars will facilitate a discussion this Thursday at 8:00 p.m. in Dey 210.

We aim to examine the distinction between human and animal, and how the presence of such a distinction affects scientific experimentation, policies and procedures.

We encourage undergraduates of all disciplines and backgrounds to attend this event in the hope of furthering the discourse presented by Matt Leming and Eli Hornstein, and attempt to discern a middle ground between both viewpoints.

Administrators and students must talk about sexual assault.

s the University's administrationcontinues to evaluate the way that sexual assault is handled at UNC, the community finds itself at a crucial crossroads.

The administration has created an online suggestion box for students to put forth their ideas about ways to prevent sexual assault and improve the University's handling of sexual assault. There have also been open meetings with the chancellor and vice chancellor to discuss the role of the Honor Court. Through these actions, along with the hiring of Gina Smith, an expert on sexual assault laws, the administration has shown that it cares about the way students and their cases are treated.

Students and student groups that get the chance to speak with administrators should keep this in mind — believing that the administration is ultimately on their side can reduce some perceived ill will and facilitate discussion that will move our campus for-

Seeing the administration as an enemy rather than as an ally won't fix the problem.

Of course, gathering student input without using it would be shameful. The administration must student ideas into reality. However, it is important for students to realize that sexual assault is a problem that affects every single college campus in the nation. The University is not going to be able to eradicate it on our campus, because that is simply unfeasible. This is not to temper expectations but to ask students to be realistic about the scope of abilities of our administrations.

be willing to turn good

UNC is at the center of a national conversation on sexual assault, and it is of the utmost importance that the student body is as creative, effective and direct as possible. This is a valuable opportunity to effect change that is too precious to waste.
