Course overcrowding pushing the limit

Increasingly popular large courses are causing issues with overcrowding.

By Liz Crampton Assistant University Editor

Maggie Boulton said finding a seat on the first day of ECON 101 caused more stress than the class itself.

"It's nothing that I'm really used to. In high school, we didn't have classes packed with 400 kids," said Boulton, a freshman.

"I felt like I was sitting down to watch a show or an exhibition of some kind. The whole atmosphere blows you away — the room is packed," she said.

But economics professor and department chair Patrick Conway said crowded courses are becoming the norm at UNC, as more students are attempting to enroll in already popular courses.

There is excess demand for the course," Conway said, in reference to the introductory economics course.

"We have a full course of 400, and we've got about 30 people sitting on the floor in the back. An awful lot of people want to get in." Boulton said she's lucky she got into the course early. "It seems like a lot of people didn't get in by the first day, because there were so many kids sitting in the back on the floor or in the

The University's squirrels are known for their sociability.

But on Thursday, freshman Nancy Smith took the precarious human-rodent relationship to the next level.

While on her way to class that morning, Smith said she came across an unusually tame squirrel in front of Rams Head Plaza.

She was intrigued by how it followed people, rather than scurry away, but she carried on with her day and went to class.

But as she was walking back to Hinton James Residence Hall later that day, she saw another student playing with what she thought was the same squirrel.

its hamper for Smith to return each day. Smith said she fed "HoJo" peanut butter, stale rolls from Panera Bread and Crystal Light sweet tea.

Rick Bradley, assistant director of assignments and communication in the housing department, said the only animals allowed in the residence halls are fish.

He added that in his 17 years at UNC, he is unaware of a case involving a squirrel.

"On average, maybe every year, there's a case of a dog. I'm sure there have been cats in the Chapel Hill welcomed its first food truck about two weeks ago, and more meals on wheels could soon be on the town's streets if the Chapel Hill Town Council revises what some are calling a restrictive ordinance.

Baguettaboutit, which sells french-bread wrapped sausages, is the only food truck permitted to operate in Chapel Hill.

Its owner, Rob Gardner, said he had wanted to operate in the town since the council passed an ordinance in January allowing food trucks to operate in private lots.

After the council received only one permit application—from Baguettaboutit — since the ordinance was passed, councilman Lee Storrow asked the council to revise the ordinance to make it less restrictive.

"Under the current ordinance, it is clear we will have minimal participation from the trucks," said Storrow.

It requires food truck owners to pay an annual $600 fee, as well as a $118 zoning compliance fee.

Storrow said many food truck owners have said the costs deter them from moving into Chapel Hill.

They felt like we created a culture and a climate with the way we talked about the ordinance that we didn't want them here," he said.

"When you compare the costs, it just doesn't make economic sense for entrepreneurs to apply for a permit from Chapel Hill."

Gardner said he decided to purchase a Chapel Hill permit because his friends and family are here.

"I think everybody would prefer if it wasn't as expensive," said Gardner. "But we all live in Chapel Hill, so it's crazy we couldn't be there."

Other food truck owners look forward to coming to Chapel Hill too.

Michael Beggen, one of the owners of the Triangle food cart Sweet Water Ices, said he is

Karma says don't steal

From staff and wire reports

tealing is bad. Stealing from hospitals is worse. Stealing from patients with deadly diseases is the worst.

A Ugandan man broke into a hospital's quarantine ward earlier in the month and stole a cellphone from a patient suffering from Ebola. And, karmically, the man now has the deadly virus.

The patient whose phone was stolen reported the theft before his death. Police tracked the phone's use, but before they could arrest the man, he returned to the hospital for medication and treatment of Ebola symptoms.

Unfortunately for his newfound medical bills, the phone he stole was worth less than $30.

NOTED. Only a few things are worse than waiting hours in customs. One of them is waiting in cages.

Seven African lions and nine Bengal tigers are suffering this caged-wait fate on the border of Paraguay. The animals are part of a circus crew and cannot enter Argentina because of paperwork. Typical.

QUOTED. "With Obama in a second term, there will be no pizza. For anyone."

– Herman Cain, one-time Republican presidential candidate and former CEO of Godfather's Pizza. While in Tampa, Fla., for the Republican National Convention, he said a world in which Obama is reelected would be worse than one without pizza.

New policy on cheating suggested

A faculty committee discussed giving more oversight to professors.

By Emily Overcarsh Assistant University Editor

Although faculty members are supposed to let the honor system handle instances of cheating, a new policy has been suggested that would give them the option to do what many already do — settle the problem on their own.

In a Faculty Executive Committee meeting on Monday, Assistant Dean of Students Melinda Manning described the idea — called the Student Faculty Resolution Process — which would allow instructors to handle cases of cheating independently of the honor system.

The current process, which includes a trial in the Honor Court, implements a standard sanction of an "F" in the course and a onesemester suspension.

Erik Hunter, judicial programs officer, said since professors don't have the authority to suspend students, punishments through the proposed policy would be less serious.

Professors could simply give an "F" on the exam in question or make the student apologize to the plagiarized author. "I think more of our students would be willing to accept responsibility if they knew suspension was not in the decision-making process," Hunter said.

Manning said faculty would only be able to use this process with firsttime offenders, and both the professor and the student could still take it to the honor system if they wanted.

"Students always have an out they can always take it to the Honor Court and face the possibility of suspension," Manning said.

Diane Horton, chairwoman of the Committee on Student Conduct, said the policy aims to allow professors a bigger role in deciding the extent of punishment the student deserves. "This was an attempt to meet in the middle," Horton said to faculty members in attendance. "To formally bring you guys to the table."

The policy will have to be approved by the student conduct committee, student government and the faculty before being implemented, Hunter said.

Another issue that was brought up for discussion is the requirement to prove guilt "beyond a reasonable doubt" in the Honor Court. Hunter said this standard of proof is unique to the University within the UNC system — and a threshold faculty members often complain is too difficult to reach.

The faculty committee also discussed the results of the Turnitin. com pilot study tested last semester. A survey found Turnitin to be "moderately effective." The University has not yet decided whether it will implement the website campuswide. Jan Boxill, chairwoman of the committee, said Turnitin would cost about $50,000 a year — equivalent to how much one Writing Center employee would be paid. She said Turnitin would be able to handle much more student work.

Still, the debate continues on the effectiveness of the site and whether it would be practical enough for the University to use across the board.

Athletes free to tweet in California

Universities may soon be unable to restrict athletes' social media.

By Leslie Carlucci Staff Writer

California could soon join other states in extending more social media privacy rights to student athletes — protections that student athletes at UNC-Chapel Hill don't have.

California's state legislature approved legislation last week that prohibits public and private higher education institutions from requiring students to provide user names, passwords or access to their personal social media accounts. The bill would become law if signed by Gov. Jerry Brown.

The use of social media by student athletes has sparked controversy in the past, especially in UNC-CH's athletic department.

Earlier this year, head women's basketball coach Sylvia Hatchell made players abstain from using Twitter after a string of underwhelming performances.

Former head football coach Butch Davis banned his players from Twitter as well, but current coach Larry Fedora has since lifted the ban.

The University athletic department's policy on social media usage states that student athletes' postings must comply with federal, state, team, department and NCAA rules.

But each team must designate at least one coach or administrator to monitor athletes' social networking sites and posts. The bill in California would outlaw that type of monitoring in the state.

tivating an audience of all ages.

The company's 13th annual summer show runs on weekends through Sept. 9.

A modern fairy tale, the show is like an imaginatively illustrated children's book coming to life.

It's a visual deluge, with handmade puppets ranging from about 2 to 20 feet tall, layers of intricate sets and fantastical masks.

The performance is not only picturesque, but it also excels in the sound department.

A full band and versatile vocalists provide the musical score, the dialogue and spot-on sound effects.

At the Sunday night show, the company encouraged audience participation for creating frog noises. When the amphibians made appearances throughout the evening, a frog chorus pervaded the full stone amphitheater, which seats about 300. "City of Frogs" follows the quest of a wooden boy, cut free from his marionette strings by the Scissors of Fate. He has one day to search for the lost heart of the girl who was born from an acorn before he must be reattached to his strings.

The story starts out a bit disjointed with a misplaced allusion to Christopher Marlowe's "Doctor Faustus," but the show soon settles into a rhythm, which the company maintains until the end.

The plot develops across a series of 13 chapters, taking the wooden boy through the busy city, down to the junk yard and into the sewers to see the dance of the frogs.

Confined to the limited movements of the puppets and people on stilts, the cast relied heavily on the sound effects and silly voices provided by the band to add an element of comedy to the show — and the band did not disappoint.

From the comical man at the dump and his sputtering dump truck to the babbling city folk causing pandemonium in the streets, the energy of the performance didn't waiver.

Paperhand Puppet Initiative creates its puppets using everything from cardboard and cornstarch to paint and fabric.

The man at the dump in "City of Frogs" teaches the wooden boy that one can take something considered to be trash and create art — which is what the company's artists have done for this show.

"City of Frogs" is a visual and musical accomplishment for Paperhand Puppet Initiative, and it kept the audience, young and old, engaged until the end.

Delaware enacted a similar law last month with protections for students at public and private higher education institutions.

Joni Worthington, spokeswoman for the UNC system, said in an email that there is no systemwide policy regarding students' social media accounts.

"Each campus would have individual social media policies and computer use policies," she said. "Some athletic departments may have special policies applicable to athletes that are different from general campus policies."

Brooke Converse, spokeswoman for the University of California system, said some athletic coaches throughout the system have requested their players add them on Facebook to monitor their behavior, but the system does not have a set policy.

Converse said the UC system will now be evaluating its social media practices to implement the legislation if it is signed into law.

Carolina Inn changes its leadership

The hotel is continuing its search for a new general manager.

By Kathryn Trogdon Staff Writer

The Carolina Inn has been a reliable Chapel Hill landmark for almost 100 years but its leaders are changing.

The hotel's parent company, Destination Hotels & Resorts, brought on a new executive chef in June and is still searching for a new general manager.

Built in 1924, the Carolina Inn sits at the corner of Cameron Avenue and Pittsboro Street on the University's campus.

On Monday, the inn said goodbye to General Manager Shawn Gracey.

Gracey, who has been the general manager at the Carolina Inn for the past two years, will return to Hotel Derek in Houston, Tex., where he worked previously.

Hotel Derek was recently acquired by Destination Hotels & Resorts, which offered Gracey the hotel's general manager position.

Although it was a difficult decision to leave, Gracey said he feels the offer came at a good time.

He said he is excited to live closer to his family in Houston but disappointed to be leaving Chapel Hill.

"It's been an honor for me to be here," Gracey said.

Joe Henry will be the interim general manager until the inn finds a permanent replacement.

James Clark joined the Inn's team on June 18 as the new executive chef for its restaurant, Carolina Crossroads Restaurant & Bar.

He said he has enjoyed getting to know the town — and the new kitchen.

"Really I wanted to come here because the Carolina Inn has a great tradition for great food and great service," Clark said.

He said he likes the local and sustainable foods available in the area — especially at the Carrboro Farmers' Market.

"It's great food that is not only great but sustainable as well," he said. "Here, using local, sustainable foods is a standard."

Clark said he incorporates locally grown ingredients into his dishes, which change seasonally.

"Food is changing all the time. Today, I'm excited about getting myself geared up for the fall," Clark said. "

"I'm looking at those winter squashes and pumpkins and oysters."

Carolina Crossroads customers say the quality of food has remained high so far, despite the change in kitchen staff.

"It was just breakfast, but it was really good," said Lauren Baker, a freshman at UNC who ate at the restaurant this month.

"I just really liked being at the Carolina Inn."

UNC junior Carter Hottovy ate at The Carolina Inn last year when Jimmy Reale was executive chef. He ate mushroom ravioli, which he rated a 7 or 8 out of 10.

Elon to be the first to see new offense

By Brandon Moree Sports Editor

North Carolina head coach Larry Fedora is new in town, so this time no one should be offended that he doesn't know exactly where Elon is geographically.

"It's in North Carolina," he said Monday in his first weekly press conference of the season. "I know that."

Elon is less than 40 miles west of Chapel Hill and Saturday, the Phoenix will make the short trip down Interstate 40 to open the 2012 season in Kenan Stadium.

Even though Fedora doesn't know where they are, he knows where they'll be coming from when it comes to the game plan.

"(Elon) has a quarterback that can throw the football," Fedora said. "The kid's sixfour, 222 (pounds), and he's got a really good arm." Senior quarterback

Thomas Wilson has wide receiver Aaron Mellette as a weapon in his arsenal. Fedora said Mellette could play anywhere in the country.

North Carolina quarterback Bryn Renner said he has been studying film on the Phoenix and believes the Football Championship Subdivision team to be very good.

"They've got a lot of guys coming back," Renner said. 'They're a veteran group. Just watching them on film they fly around, they attack the ball. We're going to have our hands full."

Saturday is not only the first game of the season and the first regular season game of Fedora's career at UNC it is also the first match up ever between Elon and North Carolina.

Additionally, it is the first official game in which the Tar Heels will run Fedora's fast paced spread offense and 4-2-5 defense. Fedora said the game will be a good barometer of how the Tar Heels received the new systems.

"It will be a great test for us defensively to find out where we are," he said. "On the defensive side of the ball, they are not afraid to play man coverage and bring people ... We will have our work cut out for us."

The Tar Heels will be using all three running backs against Elon. Fedora made it clear that Giovani Bernard, a large course can be offputting for professors, as it requires a creative approach to leading a class.

"I avoided teaching (ECON 101) for 20 years and finally got nailed," Turchi said.

"The idea of professors droning on in front of a large number of students didn't really appeal to me."

But he said the only solutions to overcrowded courses are offering more sections or dditional large lecture halls both of which are impossible. "As far as restructuring, given the budgetary situation, there's no way in the world we could do that – we couldn't even think of that," Turchi said. "It's only gotten worse."

safety of the squirrel, Smith said she contacted CLAWS Inc., a local wildlife organization, to take it away.

But Kindra Mammone, executive director of CLAWS, said the organization does not keep squirrels.

She added that squirrels make the world's worst pets.

"Squirrels are just too nervous to be a pet — they're too nervous, they have very sharp claws," she said.

'Typically they don't like to be held - so you end up getting bitten or scratched. It's cruel. They don't need to be contained."

But CLAWS did send an affiliate who takes care of dozens of squirrels to retrieve "HoJo," Smith said.

Smith said she and the affiliate talked about retraining the squirrel to go back out into the wild, but concluded that it might be used for education programs in the future.

Sophomore Tyler O'Brien said he admires Smith for temporarily adopting the squirrel.

"You know, they say that the amount of squirrels on campus is indicative of how fantastic the school is," O'Brien said. "I say we get an A+."

Smith said she had a hard time letting "HoJo" go, but she will always remember her experience.

"It was one for the grandkids, I guess," she said.

Isaac to make landfall 7 years after Katrina

LOS ANGELES (MCT) -Isaac is now barreling toward New Orleans, slated to make landfall late Tuesday or Wednesday on the Gulf Coast. But the name on many people's minds is Katrina. which devastated the same area almost seven years ago to the day.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal has declared a state of emergency ahead of the storm, urging thousands to evacuate. Isaac is expected to swell in strength to a Category 1 or 2 hurricane by the time it reaches the coastline, and has the potential to cause massive flooding and wind damage.

That said, the unpredictable storm does not appear to be anywhere near as powerful as Hurricane Katrina. That storm, which at one point was tagged as a Category 5 hurricane, devastated the Gulf Coast when it made landfall in Louisiana on Aug. 29, 2005.

Two Americans dead from 'insider' shooting

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan (MCT) - An "insider" shooting killed two more U.S. troops on Monday, while a concerted bout of violence in southern Afghanistan left 27 people dead in two separate incidents, including 17 party-goers who were slaughtered by suspected Taliban at a gathering where music and dancing were taking place, officials said.

The deaths of the two Americans in Laghman province, in eastern Afghanistan. followed a grimly familiar script: The attack was set off by an argument between Afghan soldiers and their U.S. counterparts, according to Sarhadi Zewak, a provincial spokesman. The NATO force confirmed the deaths of two Western troops at the hands of an Afghan National Army soldier, but provided no other details.

Republicans attempt to court Hispanic vote

TAMPA, Fla. (MCT) -From Ted Cruz in Texas to Marco Rubio in Florida, Republicans are touting significant electoral victories by Hispanic candidates as the breakthrough they need to reach out to the booming group of voters.

But the GOP still lags far behind in winning Hispanic votes, thanks in part to its hard-line rhetoric on immigration. Republicans hope to start to reverse the tide at their national convention, with an eye on Florida and Southwest swing states key to Mitt Romney's hopes of unseating President Barack Obama.

A new recruitment, stronger rules

By Katie Quine Assistant University Editor

UNC sororities have amped up for fall recruitment – and so has the Panhellenic Council, by updating its rules on how new members are recruited.

The sorority recruitment process began yesterday. Sororities have seen more strongly enforced regulations on activity as of this summer.

Chapters that violate the "no booze, no boys" and anti-bid promising policies will face steeper fines than in years past and might see delays in their social calendars, said Ana Samper, president for the Panhellenic Council.

"No booze, no boys," which spans throughout the recruitment period, forbids both established and prospective sorority members from drinking alcohol and speaking to men.

Samper said she hopes these stricter regulations will make for a fairer, less stressful recruitment process for freshmen and upperclassmen alike

"We'll have a lot more girls who are pleased not only with their overall experience but with the bid they're extended, and they'll feel it is more positive all the way around," she said.

Freshman Molly

"I just want to get all my work done and not have any distractions."

Molly McAdams, UNC freshman

McAdams, who plans on rushing, said she finds the recruitment policies to be fair.

"I actually like ("no booze, no boys") because that means I won't get to go out as much and I can actually focus on my academics, which I know seems kind of corny," McAdams said. "But I just want to get all my work done and not have any distractions."

Samper said she also believes upperclassmen who wish to rush will be more comfortable during the process now that the council has clarified regulations concerning quotas for sophomore, juniors and seniors during recruitment.

While Samper doesn't vet know how successful the recruitment process will be overall, she said clearer and sterner policies have already had a positive influence on some areas of recruitment.

Since the Panhellenic Council has prohibited summer parties, defined as events with three or more chapter members and five potential new members present, members have not heard of any parties occurring.

"Everyone is pretty much aware of how visible Panhellenic is right now, so it's kind of like a team effort to make sure we get to maintain our self-governing powers," Samper said.

She also said that the Panhellenic Council has seen a lot more interest from potential members, with more than 700 girls registered for recruitment.

Jermisha Dodson, an adviser to the Panhellenic executive board, said the organization's decision to better enforce its own regulations demonstrates its commitment to making Greek life better for all.

"They were very forwardthinking when the Board of Trustees came to Greek life as a whole," Dodson said, alluding to when the Board of Trustees suggested reform to the Greek system in 2010.

"I definitely see this as a testament to their leadership and a willingness to want to make Panhellenic a better community," she said.

Orange County to be represented at DNC

By Cheney Gardner Staff Writer

With the 2012 Democratic National Convention only days away, four Orange County residents are getting especially excited.

Chapel Hill Mayor Mark Kleinschmidt, Orange County Democratic Party Chair Matt Hughes, the party's Booker Creek precinct Vice-Chair Jake Gellar-Goad, and N.C. Rep. Verla Insko (D-Orange) will serve as delegates from Orange County

"This is really my first foray into any sort of national level Democratic activity," Hughes said. "Being there will be one of the highlights of my political career."

The Democratic National

party members from across the country.

North Carolina will send 158 delegates to the convention.

Insko and Hughes were elected as delegates at a district convention on May 19. Kleinschmidt and Gellar-Goad both lost at the district level, but they went on to win nominations at the state convention in Raleigh on June 16.

"When I didn't win at the district level, I was not very optimistic that I would win at statewide level," Kleinschmidt said.

"But I just said 'Well, I'll go for it,' and I was very fortunate to be one of only a handful of people who were elected at the state level."

Gellar-Goad said that he ed with messages.

"It was all a very exciting experience for someone who is new to this and isn't an elected official or high in the party," he said. "I'm just a vice-chair of a small precinct in a small neighborhood."

Although President Obama is the only Democratic candidate, Insko said she thinks the delegates still have an important role to play.

This will be a time to really motivate the base, bring people together and get them excited about the last push," she said.

Democratic Party members will also hear from distinguished speakers like former President Bill Clinton, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, and Obama

"The only thing I haven't RSVP'd for is sleep."

Delegates will also have the opportunity to attend smallgroup meetings to discuss hot-button topics like health care and marriage equality. Despite the excitement about the convention's events,

"I'm there to cast my vote and nominate the president as the standard bearer of the Democratic party," Kleinschmidt said.

"I really believe that this year's presidential election provides two very different paths that our country might go down. With the President and the past that he has, I have a lot of confidence in that direction."

Debate continues on planned county light rail

By Daniel Schere Staff Writer

Orange County residents have yet to vote on a half-cent sales tax increase to fund transit construction, but plans for a light rail and highways are already in the works.

The proposed light rail would connect Orange, Durham and Wake Counties as early as 2025 -though the plan has concerned some residents who worry it won't benefit them.

Members of several advisory boards met Monday to hear a presentation by the Durham-Chapel Hill-Carrboro Metropolitan Planning Organization, which presented a 28-year projection model for county growth and transit options.

If members of the organization want to apply for state and federal funding for highway and rail construction, a growth plan encompassing at least 20 years must be created, said Andrew Henry, transit planner for the Metro Planning Organization.

The All-in-Transit plan includes extending a light rail through the University's campus and towards Eubanks Road, as part of a 520-mile rail line stretching through the Triangle.

Another, less transit-intensive plan calls for 150 miles of track and would add 261 miles of roadway.

Both plans rely on funding from the proposed halfcent sales tax increase - if it is approved by voters in November.

Orange County Vice-Chairwoman Pam

Hemminger is optimistic voters will approve the tax.

"The urban areas seem to be supportive of it, but the rural ones not so much," she said.

Durham County voters approved a similar tax increase last year but Wake County Commissioners refused to put one on their ballot this year, which Henry says is a concern.

"If you look at the plan in Durham, it goes through the western part of Durham, through downtown, through RTP and into downtown Raleigh," he said.

"So if Wake County doesn't participate I don't know if that commuter rail line is going to be viable."

Henry said there may be additional sources of revenue like vehicle registration fees - that could be used to fund the rail and highway projects.

Over the course of the next month, a series of public hearings about the plan will take place.

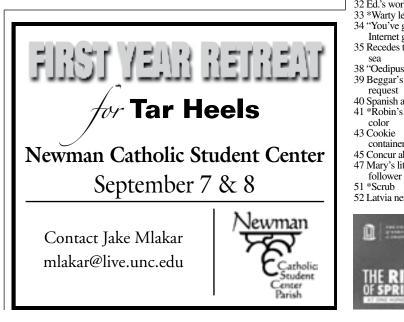

Henry said a decision will be made on the preferred option in October after receiving comments from the public and advisory boards. He emphasized the importance of educating the public.

"We're trying to let people know what the alternatives are," he said.

David Bonk, long-range and transportation planning manager for Chapel Hill, acknowledged that a light rail would cost several billion dollars and would only benefit a select number of commuters in areas adjacent to the line.

"If people who are within access of it will use it, that's the criteria we should use," he said. "There's still going to be a considerable amount of travel by road."

True life: 'Tweet the Parents'

🔪 ix months ago, I lost my father in a horrible accident: I lost him to Twitter. I never even got to say goodbye.

We knew we might lose him two years earlier, when a doctor explained that he could text to avoid speaking on the phone.

Still, as much as you prepare, it's never easy losing a parent.

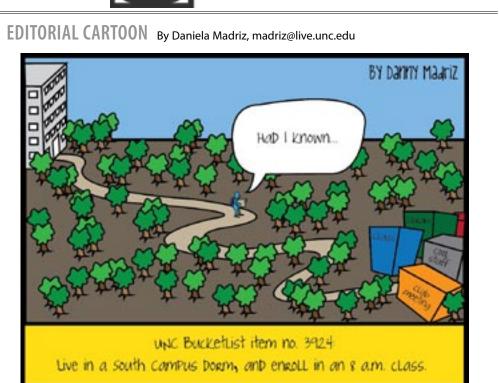

When the symptoms came, they started small. Little things, like welcoming me home at the airport with the heart-swelling message: "Left your car in parking deck." (True.)

Before that, there was the email that my dog died. (Also true.) That last one may seem insensitive, but to be fair, the subject line was a sad face.

These next few months are going to be particularly difficult. Fall was always his favorite season. Maybe, when the leaves start to turn, I'll visit his Facebook page and remember the good times. I might leave him little notes, telling him how I'm doing. It may seem silly to you, but I know in my heart he'd be somewhere reading them.

He's not the only victim. Technology's advanced so far that scientists now believe a cure for family may not be as far off as we once feared.

Today, it seems like every-

Money should not be wasted in the provost search.

hancellor Holden Thorp announced I last week Provost Bruce Carney would be stepping down from his position on June 30.

Given the importance of the provost position, the search process for Carney's replacement should be thoughtful and reflect the needs of the University.

But administrators should avoid wasting time and money by first figuring out if what they want is in their own backyard.

When Carney's predecessor. Bernadette Gray-Little, resigned, administrators appointed

But when Thorp asked Carney in 2009 to take on the position full-time, he wasn't even a search committee find.

Relying on headhunting firms, a common practice in higher education, is costly and, like in the 2009 provost search, could be fruitless if none of the finalists match the University's needs.

Before Carney's appointment, Funk & Associates assisted UNC in the 2008 search for a chancellor, looking nationfor the position.

His replacement as dean of the College of Arts & Sciences, Karen Gil, was also an internal candidate hired following a national search. UNC budgeted just below $500,000 to find those three administrators. Internal candidates

'Amateur athletics' taint the University

TO THE EDITOR:

Writing as a graduate of UNC, it seems the recent scandal entwining the administration, academe and the UNC football program has not aroused as much anger or shame among the alumni as it should.

This scandal, along with all the other scandals of college sports throughout the country, has shown beyond all doubt that college teams are nothing more than profitable nurseries for the pros, not to be trifled with.

Why do we still pretend there is such a thing as a "student athlete" or "amateur athletics?" It's all nonsense. Quite frankly, it was nonsense 40 years ago, but then it was still possible to ignore. Not any longer.

Taking the long view, these scandals reflect the dissolution of nearly all institutions of American society under the darkening shadow of greed's invisible hand. Everything's for sale, including UNC.

There's little left anywhere in which to believe for its own sake; Our institutions are simply mechanisms for marketing, exploitation and profit.

Certainly, it's hard to believe UNC will ever again even appear to embody the ideals of the university as a community of learning and teaching encompassing the generations. Those bonds ive heen hroker

Facebook was clearly a very bad investment

TO THE EDITOR: Janet Cowell (N.C. Treasurer who wishes to sue Facebook for losses incurred from investment in their IPO) ought to be ashamed of herself.

Yes, Facebook was extremely overvalued when it went public, but it didn't take any inside information to know that!

Cowell was quoted as follows: "Facebook ... told one thing to the public, but shared the real facts with only a few select investors on Wall Street."

Here are two real facts that were available to the public before the May 18 offering

- Facebook offered to pay 0 dividends.

- Facebook was offered at a price to earnings ratio of 91.2 to 1 (Google's P/E is 19.9, Apple's is 15.6).

What else did Cowell need to know better? She took a stupid risk, in spite of the glaring warning signs. And the suit against the company is just sad.

A helpful primer on campus longboarding

TO THE EDITOR:

Let's be real here: If you don't longboard, you probably think those who do are either ridiculously handsome daredevils or suicidal maniacs.

Truth is, we're just ridiculously handsome. We're all regular students trying to get around campus just like those of you who walk, bike or take the bus.

Our method just a little riskier. To protect us riders and you pedestrians, I wanted to tell you a few things. First: Yes, there's a difference between a longboard and a skateboard. A skateboard is geared for doing tricks, whereas a longboard operates much better over distances and hills. Second: Longboarding is not illegal. If we're skating down ramps, in buildings or in parking decks, then we can get our boards taken away. If we're riding around campus in appropriate places and without being a danger to ourselves or others, we are golden. As a matter of fact, we even have a Universitysanctioned club that promotes safety and community. Find UNC Longboarding on Facebook to find out more! Third: That riding back and forth thing we do while we're going down a hill? It's called carving. Essentially, we do it so we don't go too fast. When you see one of us riding towards you, please don't try that awkward hopback-and-forth game we've all played with other pedestrians. Just give us enough room to skate by. A high five would be nice too!

Who could forget N.Y. Rep. Anthony Weiner resigning after tweeting photos of his junk? Maybe I'm old fashioned, but when I was young, if a man flashed his penis to a woman, he had the common courtesy to do it in person. There's no human connection anymore

But as much as I'd like to point the finger at my father for our own problems communicating, truth is, I'm just as guilty. Oh, how often I've tried to force the Internet on my grandparents.

Sometimes, when I'm at my lowest, I like to fantasize about a world where all I'd have to say was, "I'd really love to talk more about your sore testicle, Grandpa, but unfortunately, we're running out of characters."

I can see myself on my deathbed -100 years from now, surrounded by admirers and a full head of hair - taking my son's arm and saying weakly, "You've grown so much. I remember when you lost your first follower. But I wasn't there for so much. I ... I should have retweeted you more." Then, I'll chuckle at the line, add it to my Facebook quotes page and slip away.

Well, enough is enough. Starting today, I'm on a mission to get my family back. I will not tweet them, I will not text them. Hell, I won't even like them. Even if it means we only speak once a year. And, actually, this whole thing is sounding better and better.

So please, let my family's tragedy be an example for yours.

Take a good look in the mirror. If our story rings true in your own life, put down the phone. Then, pick it back up again. Do you see those little number-looking things? Try pressing them until you reach someone. It's our only hope.

And you can also follow my progress @memetwalker.

Professors' consideration of the drop-add period more as a time for exploration would promote students' intellectual experimentation

Many schools adopt a versities maintaining the registration process before the start of the semester and other universities registering students only after the end of the shopping period.

Given UNC's size, it would be a logistical nightmare to relinquish our preregistration process entirely. However, considering the first week of classes as

Athletes on social media

Monitoring social media shouldn't stifle free speech.

▼ tudent athletes throughout the country occasionally get in trouble with the NCAA when they use social media websites inappropriately. Coaches have various ways of avoiding these issues, especially with Twitter. This week, the University of Louisville and the University of Kentucky began using monitoring software on athletes' social media accounts. Anytime a student athlete posts a word that is flagged by the University, or an obscene photo, a member of the student athlete's coaching staff immediately receives an email alert.

These words are flagged in order to prevent any posts that could tarnish or embarrass the student or university. Words range from names of agents to 'drunk' and 'fight.'

UNC's athletic department uses a similar system, through the company Varsity Monitor.

The athletic department should work to promote the monitoring software as an educational tool, rather than to use it as a way to censor speech.

The social media monitoring policy is better than banning student athletes from using Twitter because it still protects their freedom of speech.

However, flagged items are almost always taken down. Sylvia Hatchell, the women's basketball coach, even banned her players from Twitter.

While there is value in giving coaches the ability to monitor tweets with inflammatory words, it is important the student athletes have the final say in what they post online.

Varsity athletes can accumulate thousands of religious Twitter followers. It can be easy to forget how much influence they have. The position these student athletes are in provide a unique circumstance in which they are held to a higher standard than an everyday student when it comes to interacting on social media.

We've heard all kinds of promises from Chancellor Holden Thorp that the UNC administration will restore faith in UNC. But no thinking person believes the football program will suffer hard consequences or that the University will enact serious, practical reforms.

The morally right decision would be to drop the football program altogether; it is pernicious.

That won't happen though; too much money's involved - too much venality and too much cowardice. Indeed, we're likely to discover the same corruption in the venerable basketball program. Now wouldn't that give shudders to the Rams Club!

What to do? A few stubbornly idealistic friends from the early 1970s and I - we all are now approaching the age of 60 - arenow asking ourselves if we should go back to Chapel Hill to burn our diplomas at the Old Well to protest Carolina's utter subordination to commerce.

It won't mean anything practically, of course, but fire's as good a way as any for a few to say goodbye to a fallen ideal: the University.
