Roy Williams and the Tar Heels celebrate after their 88-74 win against Notre Dame on Sunday, advancing them to the Final Four.

Paige answered with a jumper to regain the lead for the Tar Heels, but they still needed a spark one Theo Pinson was ready to provide. "We were going bucket for bucket, and we had to stop that really quickly," Pinson said. "Bonzie (Colson) just held the ball out in front of me, and I swiped at it one time and got a piece (of it)."

Angry Brice returns to fuel UNC's win

A technical foul couldn't halt Johnson's 23rd double-double.

PHILADELPHIA - Angry Brice was back. It's often good for the North Carolina men's basketball team when that's the case for Brice Johnson — but not at this moment.

After a Notre Dame rebound with 13:17 left in the second half, with the Tar Heels in the midst of letting an 11-point lead disappear into thin Philadelphia air, Johnson was called for a foul.

"It was really dumb on my part to put my teammates in a situation like that," Johnson said after the game. "Being a leader on this team, I don't want to do that and have myself not be in the game and hurting them at the same time by getting the tech."

Johnson put the topseeded Tar Heels in that situation after leading them to a 43-38 edge in the first half. He led UNC with 15 points by showing the ability to hit mid-range and elbow jumpers - an aspect of his game that's often overlooked by his ability to score in the post and paint He had also hauled in eight rebounds to help give his team a 13-7 edge on the glass at halftime. But with just over 13 minutes left in the second half, with Kennedy Meeks' singlehanded 8-0 run essentially thrown out the window, with the Tar Heels losing in a loseand-go-home game, Johnson did not have his team in the right situation.

PHILADELPHIA — The players on the North Carolina bench stood on their feet, waving their arms and urging the sea of fans clad in Carolina Blue to stand with them as the final seconds ticked off the clock.

Less than a minute remained in the Tar Heels' 88-74 win over Notre Dame in the Elite Eight, but the celebration was already underway.

When the final buzzer sounded,

Tar Heels knew they were going to the Final Four.

"Four years," Paige recalled telling Johnson as they hugged. "Four years. This is what makes it all worth it."

But before the elation, the trophy presentation and the cutting of the nets, UNC was once again forced to use its defense to turn things around.

After entering halftime with a 43-38 advantage, North Carolina jumped out to a 51-40 lead.

That lead quickly turned into a onepoint deficit. The Fighting Irish went on a 12-0 run over a three-minute

The ball rolled away from both players, a swing of momentum potentially riding on who could corral it first. Pinson knew it had to be him.

A new law undoing statewide anti-discrimination policies for LGBT individuals will prevent the University from allowing individuals to use the bathroom of their gender identity, requiring instead that they use the bathroom corresponding to their gender assigned at birth.

The N.C. General Assembly passed the bill, called House Bill 2, in a special session. Gov. Pat McCrory signed the bill into law Wednesday night.

Lauren Martin, president of the Sexuality and Gender Alliance, said the bill represents a dangerous power structure that could hurt progress on UNC's campus.

"The fact that a bill can pass within a few hours of being written and discussed and signed that explicitly discriminates against LGBTQ people — it's very scary that your state can have such strong feelings about its people or constituents," Martin said.

Martin said the bill will complicate the process of creating more gender-neutral bathrooms on campus which has already proved challenging.

According to the UNC LGBTQ Center's website, there are currently 57 gender nonspecific or single stall bathrooms with a locking exterior door on campus. First-year Brennan Lewis said the legislation was kept away from the general public. "He just rushed everything through so quickly. It was kind of sketchy - what kind of governor signs a bill at 10:30 at night?" Lewis said.

Lewis said the bill shows the General Assembly does not care about all of its constituents.

"It's saying that LGBTQ students aren't citizens, basically. It tells trans students that they're dangerous and abnormal, which is really terrible for folks' mental health," Lewis said.

Regan Buchanan, co-president of the Campus Y, said it's important for students to contact their legislators.

"Just because this bill is law doesn't mean that they shouldn't hear from you. They should know that they're not representing the interests of their constituents because that's what they're elected to do," Buchanan said.

Buchanan said she was disappointed the bill was passed but not surprised.

"The N.C. legislature has a history and a pattern of legislating to marginalized individuals that aren't white and wealthy," Buchanan said.

"We're saying that we need to dismantle the structure and stop letting things like this happen and prevent the elections of ignorant people to the North Carolina legislature.

The General Assembly did not make the bill public until the day it was passed, which eadership in Energy and Environmental Designcertified energy projects have cropped up in the most peculiar of places: Northside Elementary School in Chapel Hill, the courthouse in downtown Durham, the Greenbridge mixed-use development in Chapel Hill and the Genome Science Building on campus. And, early last year, I learned that Orange County hired an architecture firm "well-versed in correctional center and energy-efficient design" to plan a new $20 million jail.

Yet, for me, these developments incite disdain, rather than excitement.

Below the skylights of Northside Elementary School, school discipline and policing policies are actively surveilling and pathologizing Black and Brown youth. Black students are deemed defiant, disruptive and disrespectful and are five times more likely to receive suspensions than white students across Chapel Hill-Carrboro City Schools. Beyond these glaring disparities exists a reality in which our schools are operating as spaces of racial violence.

Beneath the green roof of the Durham County courthouse, the court and prison systems are reproducing the racialized underpinnings of chattel slavery. Black and Brown people are being criminalized, contained and killed. "The judicial branch of the government was made to recycle us," writes Thomas Clayton, an inmate in the detention facility awaiting trial. In the shadows of the solar installations at Greenbridge, developers are exploiting urban rent gaps and uprooting the neighboring Black, working-class Northside community. The development perpetuates insidious and racialized processes of gentrification that have marginalized Northside residents for decades. The Genome Science Building, our campus' latest fixture, is situated within a racialized campus geography. Our university's commitment to sustainability and innovation competes with its commitment to preserving a tradition of white supremacy and racism. The more I see LEED certification, the more I realize that commitments to sustainability are false metrics of ethics. Greenness permeates within sites of oppression to mask systems of racial capitalism. The capital leveraged to "greenwash" institutions is the same capital repurposed to oppress Black and Brown people. The recycling of physical material juxtaposes the recycling of Black and Brown bodies, just as the commodification of carbon emissions parallels the commodification of Black and Brown labor. Such insidious processes of marginalization have been sanitized under the guise of energy efficiency and sustainability. Oppression is OK as long as it's LEED certified. As an environmental studies minor, I am concerned by how institutions manipulate sustainability and innovation to convey an ethos of ethicality. Sustainability exists at the nexus of environmental, social and economic justice, and commitments to sustainability should require more than a LEED plaque at the front door. LEED-certified injustice is still injustice.

Many states, many rates

n Monday, a reporter asked Margaret Spellings her thoughts on granting in-state tuition for undocumented students. Spellings seemed to hesitate slightly, replying: "I come from a state that that's been a long standing policy of the state." Though prefacing that "obviously the Board of Governors and the legislature need to weigh in on this," she stated, "I've seen it be successful in Texas — in a state with many, many miles of borders."

She's right. When it comes to instate tuition for undocumented students on this campus, many might think of the issue in terms of activism. For years now, student organizers, professors and experts have been pressing for North Carolina to grant in-state tuition to undocumented students. They have tirelessly worked through many avenues, including the One State One Rate campaign, for which this board has previously expressed its support.

beyond the University or bevond our state's current climate of divisive politics. Thanks to pushback from North Carolina lawmakers, it has become easy to forget a few facts: Granting in-state tuition for undocumented students is not innately partisan. It is not innately divisive. In fact, it is not innately controversial.

And on Monday morning, the proud partisan Spellings actually reminded us of this.

She reminded us of a history of measures to grant in-state tuition in many other states — at least 18 others, to be exact. And the common denominator among these states is not the partisanship of their citizens or their governments. Rather, it is the large size of the undocumented populations in these states.

Spellings' statement reminds us that this discussion does not need to be from public high schools. Spellings should publicly recognize that granting in-state tuition to undocumented students is both a logical and moral fulfillment of the University's mission.

For Spellings to advocate for this would be in line with her own rhetoric of affordability and of education as a tool of social mobility. From the precedent laid in 1982 in the landmark Supreme Court case Pyler v. Doe, we have guaranteed undocumented students the right to public education through high school. And we have left it to the states to decide whether these students can affordably pursue public higher education as well.

If Spellings truly believes that higher education is a new fundamental right, then she should seize this opportunity to pressure lawmakers to allow undocumented stu-

Ways to donate to fight against cancer

TO THE EDITOR:

My name is Princy Varghese, and I am the sister of Vincey Varghese, who recently passed away on March 16, 2016.

She suffered from a rare brain tumor called sarcoma. Less than one percent of people in the U.S. are diagnosed with this type of cancer.

Thank you so much for all of your support in the article that was recently published in The Daily Tar Heel.

Yesterday my family and I, along with Pastor Troy Davis of Calvary Church, published a gofundme. com/vinceyvarghese campaign. We have compiled over $50,000 in debt in just one weeks' time. Our goal is to raise $75,000, and a portion of every donation will go to fighting pediatric cancer. We are asking if you would consider publishing this GoFundme Campaign in next week's DTH.

I am also in contact with Ashley Buige, a current student at UNC-Chapel Hill.

A group of her friends have started a team dedicated to Vincey to walk in her memory. The walk is at UNC-Chapel Hill on Fetzer Field on Friday, April 15 from 6 p.m. to April 16 at 9 a.m.

Ban on e-cigs is just in protecting people

TO THE EDITOR:

The UNC Nicotine Dependence Program works with thousands of people to fight the powerful addiction to nicotine while facing a host of obstacles, including tobacco industry misinformation and insurance company denials of medications that help minimize withdrawal and support behavioral change.

We strongly support the Orange County Board of Health's efforts to implement common sense regulation on e-cigarette/vapor use in public spaces.

While adults are free to make decisions harmful to themselves, exposing others to that harm is not part of our social contract. E-cigarette vapor contains harmful chemical constituents. Over 400 manufacturers produce these products with different formulations.

Until regulation exists to ensure safety, the BOH serves the public by addressing concerns of the vast majority of people who do not wish to be exposed to nicotine vaping. The tobacco and vaping industries (increasingly one and the same) spend billions annually in marketing, much of it designed to appeal to youth.

All citizens, and especially youth, pregnant women, people with asthma or disease and other high risk groups, have the right to clean air in public spaces. Our Orange County BOH, appointed by elected county commissioners, serves as a policy-making and adjudicatory body, "charged to protect and promote the public health of Orange County." Mandated by state law, its members are health care professionals (www. orangecountync.gov). They are not, as your recent editorial pejoratively suggests, bureaucrats. Research by our Tobacco Prevention and Evaluation Program and national data show that adoption of smoke-free ordinances can increase business profitability, contrary to tobacco industry claims that restaurants and bars' business would suffer. What has worked most effectively to reduce tobacco use in recent decades is not education and social pressure alone, but measures that integrate educational, clinical, regulatory, economic and social strategies.

Friends, Waffles, Work Alice Wilder writes about telling others less.

But this admirable campaign has gone on for so long that it has become possible to lose sight of the context of this issue heated, nor in most states is it relegated to a sphere of activism. In most states with undocumented populations the size of North Carolina's, it is law. This includes traditionally conservative states like Texas.

These states have crafted the commonsense, across-the-aisle solution: To grant in-state tuition to those undocumented students that have graduated dents to access this right.

But we are not simply relying on Spellings to respond to this issue. We strongly encourage students on our campus and residents of our community to continue exerting pressure on Spellings and our lawmakers.

This is not an issue decided by party lines, but by fundamental promises of opportunity.

EDITORIAL Next up to bat ...

Women ought be included in America's pastime.

e all have heard the story. It was April 15, 1947, in Brooklyn. Jackie Robinson stepped out of the dugout at Ebbets Field, took first base and broke the color barrier of baseball.

Baseball has always called itself the great equalizer — this became more true after Robinson broke the color barrier. This was a massive step toward equality for the nation and for baseball, but as we see in other national issues, women are still excluded from many aspects of both the national and baseball conversations. This board is calling for the inclusion of women in baseball both as a general sport and as a professional career.

Even in the modern era of baseball, women have played professionally. Dorothy "Dottie" Kamenshek played professional baseball during the 1940s and 1950s, even receiving praise from professional male players for her adept ability to play first base.

This led us to ask: why are women not playing baseball today?

Despite many talented female baseball players, like Melissa Mayeux who is currently on the MLB international registration list, female baseball players are few in number. This stems from young, talented athletes being encouraged to attend youth training camps that essentially correspond with their gender boys to baseball camps, girls to softball. While professional softball does exist, it is nowhere near the capacity of pro baseball, which limits the future of extremely talented players.

Even at UNC baseball's own Elite Prospect's program the website states the camps is "open to any and all entrants. (Limited only by number, age, and grade level and gender.)" UNC ought not to discourage women from baseball, and it certainly should not have policy barring women from baseball camp.

We are not calling for a relaxation of standards within baseball camps and teams — we acknowledge that there are physical differences between men and women - we are calling for increased opportunities.

As any lover of baseball will know, the strongest and fastest player is not always the best. The hardest thrower is not always the best pitcher, and the hardest hitter is not always the best offensive player. Some of the greatest players could not consistently hit home runs, but still scored consistently.

There is no harm in giving more people more opportunities to pursue their passions. No gender should be systematically discouraged from doing anything, and baseball is not an exception. This editorial board looks forward to watching the first woman step out of the dugout, take her position and shatter the notion that baseball is a "man's sport."

Humans have the duty to help others

TO THE EDITOR:

As explained by an extraordinary public policy professor here at UNC, the concept of social justice can be imagined as a pie.

When we extend and promote the rights of one group, we're not taking away the rights and liberties from another group. We're not taking away a slice of your, or anyone's, pie.

We're just making the pie bigger and making sure that everyone eats at the table.

When you fail to care, represent and speak for those who cannot do so for themselves, don't be surprised when no one's there to do so for you in the time of your need.

As human beings, we have the basic duty to serve others.

He didn't fold. His play in the closing minutes of the game helped solidify UNC's 88-74 victory and ensure a trip to Houston for the achievement of one of the primary goals this team has had all season: a trip to the Final Four. "Brice Johnson — can he just miss one?" asked Notre Dame coach Mike Brey after Johnson's 25-point, 12-rebound game sent his team back to South Bend, Ind. "Can he just help us a little bit?

ately called a timeout, giving UNC a chance to settle down and reclaim ownership of the game.

Shortly after the break, sophomore guard Joel Berry made a jumper, marking the first two points of a 10-0 North Carolina run.

"It just seemed like everything clicked at the right moment," Berry said. "When we did that, it was hard for them to come back." The Fighting Irish never pulled within eight points for the rest of the game. And from that point on, the win almost seemed ensured. The Tar Heels knew they were heading to Houston. In the locker room, players and team managers posed for pictures with the East Regional trophy, and a net that previously decorated a rim of the Wells Fargo Center now fashioned around Paige's neck. For a group that entered the season with a trip to Houston as not a goal but seemingly an expectation, the joy filling the room was palpable.

An uneggspected Easter treat for dogs

Hillsborough police held its second Easter egg hunt for dogs.

By Janna Childers Staff Writer

One thousand Easter eggs were hidden at Gold Park in Hillsborough this Saturday, but no children were there to find them.

This was an Easter egg hunt for dogs only, hosted by the Hillsborough Police Department.

The idea for the unique event came from the Hillsborough Police Department's K-9 unit. The unit has two German shepherds, Vader and Viper.

Vader and Viper, like other police canines, are trained to detect narcotics, track people, search for people and help in suspect apprehension if necessary.

Cpl. Scott Foster, a K-9 handler in the unit, said the Hillsborough Police Department wanted to use the event to let the Hillsborough community know what their police canines do for the unit on a daily basis.

"Pretty much every day for our dogs is an Easter egg hunt," Foster said.

"They're searching for stuff to get a treat or a reward." This is the second Easter egg hunt for dogs hosted by the police department.

"We kind of tried it out last year to see how it would go over," Foster said.

"It was such a huge success; we decided to do it not only this year, but we're going to try to make it an annual event."

At Saturday's event, there were 1,000 eggs filled with dog treats in two separate fields.

Some of the hidden Easter eggs had stickers on them. The dog owners could trade in these eggs for prizes provided by Paws at the Corner. a pet store located in downtown Hillsborough.

Lisa Wells, one of the owners of Paws at the Corner, said she was thankful for the opportunity to be a part of

"It's a great turnout," Wells said.

"I love that they're including the dogs because there's not a lot of events that you can bring dogs to."

Jane and Kevin McMullen brought their two black Lab mixes, Hobbes and Star, to the egg hunt.

They attended the Easter egg hunt last year and said they were glad it was happening again.

"It's just great to come out to Gold Park," Jane McMullen said. "I love learning about the police dogs."

McCrory shuts down coal ash commission

Questions of safe drinking water remain in N.C.

By CJ Farris Staff Writer

North Carolina's Coal Ash Management Commission was shut down suddenly by Gov. Pat McCrory two weeks ago.

The Coal Ash Management Commission was created by the legislature with the passage of the Coal Ash Management Act of 2014 to provide an independent review for Duke Energy's coal ash clean-up process following a 2014 spill, said Dustin Chicurel-Bayard, spokesperson for the N.C. Sierra Club, an environmental group.

The law states that the commission is responsible for reviewing the plans put forward by McCrory's administration to close coal ash ponds and ensure that coal ash near communities is handled in the safest and most proper way.

"The decision to abolish the commission itself raises the question of why doesn't the McCrory administration want an independent review of these coal ash closure plans?" Chicurel-Bayard said.

McCrory's move to abolish the commission comes after the 2015 McCrory v. Berger case that determined the governor, not the legislature, had appointment power for the commission.

Chicurel-Bayard said power companies dispose of coal ash, or the leftover material from power plants burning coal, by dumping it into large pits and mixing it with water so that the ash does not blow away.

But in February 2014, a storm water pipe underneath the coal ash basin at a retired Duke Energy coal plant broke and allowed up to 39,000 tons of coal ash to pour into the Dan River, according to Duke Energy's website.

Paige Sheehan, a spokes-

"... Why doesn't the McCrory administration want an independent review of these coal ash closure plans?"

Dustin Chicurel-Bayard, spokesperson for N.C. Sierra Club person for Duke Energy, said in an email despite the dissolution of the Coal Ash Management Commission, she does not see Duke's plan to close ash basins changing.

"Regarding the Coal Ash Management Commission, our position is that we will comply with the rules and laws related to our operations," she said. "As with any regulation that impacts our company, we'll welcome clarity and certainty."

Sheehan said Duke Energy is working to excavate and move all sites it is currently required to under the law.

Chicurel-Bayard said coal ash sites should be moved to landfills with ground water monitoring systems, but without the commission, some pits might receive classifications that would allow them to remain in place and continue polluting ground water. "The one concern is that without the independent review, some of these coal ash classifications might stand as they are - (the classifications are) put out there by Governor McCrory's administration," he said.

As it stands, Chicurel-Bayard said the governor's actions create more uncertainty about the safety of North Carolina's drinking water.

"The last thing you want when you're talking about someone's drinking water is uncertainty about whether or not it's safe, and those decisions should be made on science and engineering, not politics," he said.

Two UNC faculty members and an optometrist have co-founded Resurrection Church, a new church that is based in Hillsborough.

New church aims for open discussion

By Jack Davis Staff Writer

A typical church service at Resurrection Church, which happens every Sunday at 11 a.m., is surprisingly similar to a traditional church, cofounder Chris Lundberg said until the end.

"We have a pretty traditional liturgy, creed, hymns and everything," Lundberg said. "After that we open things to questions and discussion ... for anyone to voice not only what they appreciated but also what they didn't agree with."

The new Hillsboroughbased church co-founded by two UNC professors combines thoughtful discussion with traditional Christian doctrine by focusing on the story of the resurrection.

The church's three founders - Lundberg, Trey Benfield and Praveen Sethupathy look different from a typical church staff. All three have advanced or doctorate degrees: Benfield is an optometrist, and Lundberg and Sethupathy are faculty members at UNC.

The three had concerns with the approach some churches took to discussing difficult issues, Lundberg said.

"We wanted a place that not only ministered to your soul and heart but also your mind," said Lundberg, a professor in the communication studies department. "That place was difficult to find, so we decided to roll our own."

Sethupathy, a genetics professor, said Resurrection Church fills a unique role in the religious community.

"These days it's increasingly challenging to find a worship community that is really serious and committed to their faith but at the same time is thoughtful and reflective and willing to ask hard questions," Sethupathy said.

Benfield said the discussion element of the church's early history has been lost.

"In Scripture there's this phrase — 'iron sharpens iron.' Do we really have that anymore? Because iron sharpening iron is loud. It sends sparks. I don't see that going on in the church. I just see everyone coming in their own little echo chamber," he said. "We're trying to be an alternative to that."

The church works with organizations like City of Joy Rwanda, which provides livestock to families in Rwanda, and Stop Hunger Now, which packages and donates food across the world.

Benfield said they want very little money going to the church itself. No pastor takes a salarv

"If you look at a typical church budget, the money is mostly going to go toward perpetuating the church," he said. "We're actually trying to get away from that."

Lundberg said the church is seeking to expand its 30-member congregation.

"Politically we're really diverse. We range from Cruz people to hardcore Bernie people and everything in between."

"The people who have shown up are committed Christians who are kind of misfits at their regular church wouldn't quite fit into standard, vanilla, evangelical Christianity."

Bukauskas unveils slider in series loss

With a scouting report that advises batters to be wary of the fastball, J.B. Bukauskas turned to a different pitch to out No. 25 Georgia Tech's batters – his slider.

And the adjustment paid off.

While No. 7 North Carolina (19-4, 6-3 ACC) dropped two games to the Yellow Jackets (18-5, 5-4 ACC) for its first series loss of the season, the Tar Heels shined behind Bukauskas on Friday. The sophomore pitcher went eight innings, tying his career high of 11 strikeouts and retiring 17 consecutive batters at one point to lead UNC to an 8-0 victory.

"That's the best he's thrown his slider (for extended innings)," Coach Mike Fox said Bukauskas was the only starting pitcher who found success against the Yellow Jackets this weekend.

Both junior Zac Gallen and sophomore Jason Morgan were credited with a loss as they struggled to contain Georgia Tech on Thursday and Saturday, respectively.

"They just battle out there," Gallen said. "There's no easy outs. I had trouble putting guys away."

Save a three-run fifth inning, Gallen held the Yellow Jackets scoreless in Thursday's 3-2 loss. But he was unable to come up with 1-2-3 innings early on, driving up his pitch count and keeping him from going deeper into the game.

"They were patient," said Gallen, who ended his outing after five innings. "They got what they were looking for. Put good swings on the bat and hits just kind of fell in."

All three pitchers noted that Georgia Tech thrives on the fastball. Morgan struggled to combat the Yellow Jackets in this regard in a 6-0 loss on Saturday, as one of his fastballs resulted in a home run.

"They're a first-pitch swinging team ..." Morgan said. "They were hunting fastballs."

When Bukauskas noticed how Georgia Tech took a liking to the fastball in early innings, he decided to switch to the slider. He found success with the change right away.

Bukauskas told teammates he'd been working on his slider over the summer. And sophomore shortstop Logan Warmoth noticed an improvement, saying that the slider is so successful because Bukauskas can disguise it.

"When you see it come out of his hand, you don't know it's a slider," Warmoth said. "That's exactly what those kids were saying to me when I J.B. one good pitch away from shutting down another batter, he decided to have some fun all season, he still had more with the fastball.

On April 24, 2015, Andrew Gores started what he thought would be his last match for the North Carolina men's tennis team in an ACC tournament match against Duke, losing in straight sets in his team's 4-3 win.

When the team's season ended in the quarterfinals of the NCAA Tournament with a 4-1 loss against TCU, Gores thought his injuryplagued career had come to a close.

He suffered an ankle injury during his first year on campus, causing him to redshirt that season. After playing the next season, the recurring injury caused him to miss his third season as well.

When he returned to Chapel Hill this past fall, he planned to finish his few remaining classes before heading into a job this summer as an investment analyst in Washington, D.C.

But after talking with his coaches, Gores realized he had one year of eligibility remaining.

This left him facing a tough decision. With the team talented from top to bottom, he would have to fight to gain a roster spot.

"I told him I couldn't make him any guarantees at all as far as starting or anything like that," Coach Sam Paul said. "To really think about, do you want to go through this again, and stick around and work and put everything into it?"

Gores decided he did.

"I thought we were going to get rid of him after last year," said junior Gores' perseverance has paid off this season. Including his doubles loss in UNC's 5-2 win against Virginia Tech on Sunday, his record is 9-3 this season in doubles matches with five different teammates.

Gores is enjoying every minute of 'This year has kind of been a dream come true being able to come back and be on the No. 1 team in the country," he said. "Just trying to soak it in every day and have as much fun with it as we can."

Even though he has not played in every match this season, his experience and energy have been invaluable to his teammates. He understands his role on the team and focuses on improving not just his own game every day, but that of his teammates, as well.

"I guess I'm the oldest kid on the team now being the fifth-year senior. So I definitely try to take on a leadership role ..." Gores said. "I try to share my experiences, my stories.'

Gores has been through it all - on and off the court. For some, being forced to compete for a roster spot would be too much for their pride. But that's not why Gores came back. It's about the team, not him.

He wants to guide his teammates to the NCAA Championship that has eluded them for so long.

"I'm really just trying to leave it all out there," he said. "Because from a competitive tennis (perspective), this is the last, actually, two months that I'll have for the rest of my life."

North Carolina softball coach Donna Papa emphasizes improvement every day.

In a season marked by inconsistency, the Tar Heels (15-17, 3-6 ACC) showed fight in the face of No. 11 Florida State.

And after a sweep at the hands of the ACC-leading Seminoles (26-3, 6-0 ACC), Papa held onto her principles — focusing on the positives and improvements her team made rather than the disappointing end results.

"They're a quality team, they've kind of dominated our conference in recent years," Papa said of Florida State. "But I thought we hit their pitchers (well).

In Friday's game, the UNC batters faced 4-0 and 7-2 deficits in the middle innings, but battled to stay within striking distance and trailed only 7-4 after the fourth.

But the Seminoles finally pulled away en route to a 15-6 win.

Despite the lopsided score, Papa stayed positive.

"To answer back is big, you always want to answer back," she said. "I feel like we won on everything except the scoreboard. We fought every single inning."

Saturday's doubleheader followed much of the same script.

In the first game, Florida State jumped out to a 9-2 lead after two innings but UNC fought back. Taylor Wike's two-run home run - the sophomore's sixth on the UNC's Lauren Fuller held both teams scoreless in what ultimately became a 9-6 win for the Seminoles.

Florida State finally broke through on Fuller in her start in Saturday's second game, tagging her for twelve runs - eight earned.

"They're a great hitting team," Fuller said. "So the more they see a pitcher, the better they're going to hit.'

Despite Florida State's success at the plate, the Tar Heels still refused to roll over.

A Kristen Brown RBI single in the fourth inning closed the deficit to 8-5 before Florida State broke the game open in the fifth with four runs, closing out the sweep with a 12-5 victory.

But even after three disappointing results, Mateen was positive about her team's resilience.

"We competed, we fought and punched back. When they scored in an inning, we always came back and responded," the senior said. "I think that's a great step."

After the series loss, Papa is happy for the team to put the weekend behind them and focus on moving forward.

"We lost all three games; that part stunk," Papa said. "However, I do think we're making progress to where we want to be, and it may not all happen in one game and at one time.

"It's just going to be small steps for us.'

No. 7 Tar Heels lose first series of season to Georgia Tech

UNC struggled to hit consistently in three games this weekend.

By Blake Richardson Staff Writer

Brian Miller thought the momentum had shifted. With No. 7 North Carolina down by six runs on Saturday and runners on second and third base, the sophomore stepped up to bat in the seventh inning, hoping to ignite a spark in UNC's offense against No. 25 Georgia Tech.

But that spark didn't come. Miller hit a grounder to second base and sprinted for first. The ball reached first just as Miller darted across it, and the umpire ruled him out. Missed by milliseconds.

The call — met with a chorus of boos from UNC fans ended the inning and the Tar Heels' chance at a comeback. North Carolina (19-4, 6-3 ACC) went on to lose 6-0 to the Yellow Jackets (18-5, 5-4 ACC), costing UNC its first series loss of the season.

"I've been telling our guys, in this league when you've got a starter that doesn't walk you and a defense that doesn't make mistakes, somebody's got to step up and get a big hit," Coach Mike Fox said.

That didn't happen on Thursday or Saturday. UNC fell 3-2 in the first game of the series, then managed just four hits in the series finale.

On Saturday, Georgia Tech starting pitcher Zac Ryan only tallied three strikeouts and walked three batters. But when UNC's bats connected, the balls fell close enough to Yellow Jacket gloves to prevent the Tar Heels from reaching base.

While Georgia Tech pitcher

Brandon Gold had a strong game on Thursday with five strikeouts, the bulk of UNC's difficulties came from quick outfield defense.

"I thought I hit some balls well," Miller said. "They just didn't fall a lot of times."

The Tar Heels did answer Fox's call for big hits Friday.

North Carolina pressured the Yellow Jackets with a three-run first inning in the second game of the series. The Tar Heels had 10 hits, including a home run from junior Tyler Ramirez, to claim an 8-0 victory.

Sophomore Logan

Warmoth attributed his team's success on Saturday to two-out hits. Both Warmoth and senior Eli Sutherland came up with one in the first inning, notching three collective RBIs for their team.

But in the rubber match on Saturday, UNC came up short at the plate once again.

"(We) got a little anxious," Fox said. "I think we swung at way too many first pitches against a guy that I don't think had a strong strikeout pitch."

Fox said he saw multiple opportunities to score when Georgia Tech held slim leads in Saturday's game. But North Carolina could not capitalize.

When the Tar Heels score in the first inning this season - like on Friday — the team is 14-0. But Fox said his team has struggled when trailing, worsened by its inability to string together hits.

"I mean, you've got to swing your way back into games when you're behind," Fox said. "And we obviously didn't do that today, and we haven't done it the few times we've been behind.

"So you've got to learn how to play from behind."
