Where the wild things are violated

From staff and wire reports

When police entered Peter Bower's home, the "Dearest Pet" bestiality book they found was only the beginning. Bower, a man from Shelby, Ohio, was charged with two counts of animal cruelty for partaking in sexual relations with three dogs, one of which was his 3-year-old shepherd mix.

Bower could also face charges for having a sexual encounter with a horse.

While in Bower's home, police also found a plastic, blow-up sheep and an account of Bower's sexual relations with his pets on his computer.

Police said Bower advertised dog-sitting services in Shelby and the Mansfield dog shelter. Currently, Bower is only facing misdemeanor charges because Ohio does not have laws regarding bestiality.

NOTED. Kevin Weeks cut his encounter with the Broome County Police a little too close for comfort.

Weeks, who was charged with three misdemeanors, rode his lawnmower through a Virginia City trailer park while intoxicated and then used his head to damage the Plexiglass partition in the police car.

QUOTED. "Oysters are just like giant boogers, and I used to pick my nose when I was little."

—Terri Stump, a contestant from Arizona in the Distinguished Young Women oyster eating competition in Alabama. The event took place at Wintzell's Oyster House in Orange Beach, Ala.

Jacky Arness from North Dakota won the event by eating 64 raw oysters in five minutes.
